What is to be gained by further conference? We are told that this is the fixed attitude of the House of Representatives. We have not declined to go into an inquiry in respect of any of these items; quite the reverse. When it is proposed that the mission to Great Britain, for instance, shall be reduced in point of compensation from one sum to another, which is the proposition of the House, we call for the facts and statistics upon which it is founded and we do not get any, but we are asked to reduce it now, to change the law now and inquire afterward whether we have done a wise or a foolish thing. Our idea was that the true business of legislation was to inquire before you change the law whether the change will be wise or foolish. Of course it is perfectly obvious to everybody that it is totally impossible in any just legislative sense for the conferees on a bill between the two Houses or anybody on an appropriation bill properly and fairly to have the time and the means to look into the various items and see where the public expenditures can be properly reduced; and upon that ground it was that we proposed this inquiry, leaving the law to stand as it is until we can find good reasons to change it, and if we should find good reasons to change it, then have the change take effect. In that way nothing could be lost. That was rejected.

What are we to gain by any new conference? Where are we to stand? As I say, the essential dispute, when you strip it of its flounces and furbelows and look at it in puris naturalibus, is simply this, that the House of Representatives claim that the Senate has no constitutional business to disagree to changes in existing laws that the House of Representatives chooses to demand respecting the expenditure of public money. Therefore, if it were left to me alone, I should quite agree with my honorable friend from Maine, that the present duty of the Senate, not so much to itself as to the country and to futurity, would be to recede from every one of its amendments that has increased sums, for the House conferees said over and over again that they would not put them up, and to adhere in the strictest sense—because it comes to a question of right and nothing else—to those amendments of ours which struck out the House propositions to change the existing law. That leaves the responsibility on the other body that has assumed it to determine what it will do. But I do not feel authorized to make a motion of that kind now, because that requires a little detail.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator excuse an interruption? I do not know that I understand my friend exactly. He says that he would advise that we should recede from all the amendments by which we increased the amounts appropriated in the items of the bill and insist upon retaining the laws as they are. I do not see the application exactly. For instance, take the case of the mission to England. The House bill reduced it from one amount to another by reducing the appropriation. Now if the Senate recedes, we leave it at the less amount and it stands as the salary, which is a change of the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at all. There may be a sum of money due to a man as a salary and the two Houses may not appropriate half what the law requires; they may not appropriate anything at all. The House of Representatives might refuse to insert an item, and so pass a bill, for any salary at all to the President of the United States and when it came over here if we put in an item of that kind for the salary of the President of the United States and the House say they will not agree to it what can we do about it? Nothing at all. They are responsible not to us but to the Constitution and to the people, and they take the consequences as they have a right to do of that sort of action.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator thinks the matter would be reached by that and by adhering to our amendments refusing to change the law in the latter part of the bill providing that these sums shall be in full. Is that the idea?

Mr. EDMUNDS. This bill contains two phases. One, the first part of it, is the ordinary phase of appropriating money to carry out existing laws. The House confessedly has not appropriated money enough to carry out the existing laws. Where the existing laws call for $17,500, the House of Representatives has said—and has stuck to it in the committees of conference—"We will only give $14,000." Then, at the end of the bill, or as an addition to it—it does not make any difference where it comes in the bill—they make one general and sweeping declaration that "the sums herein appropriated shall be in full;" in other words, that the salaries and provisions and everything else as provided for in this bill shall be the law.

Now, my proposition is not one that I am quite sure I ought to make at this time, although, acting on my own judgment, upon my own sense of my duty to the Constitution, to the country, to economy, to honesty, to self-respect, to everything that appeals to a just man intrusted with responsible duties, I should say that our duty is now, after all that has happened, to declare to the House of Representatives, "We cannot compel you and we do not claim the right to compel you to appropriate a dollar more money than you like, whether the law calls for it or not; we therefore, after all that has taken place, take the money you propose and recede from every proposition of ours to increase the sums up to the law." Then, when it comes to the other provision of making a new law as to what various persons are entitled to and whether establishments shall be kept up or not, then, I say, we have reached the point where the Senate owes it to itself—which is the least thing personally—owes it to the Constitution, owes it to the people, to the Republic, owes it to economy and retrenchment, to say, "We adhere to our amendment rejecting from your bill propositions to make a new law that you have given us no reason for making, whether on an appropriation bill or any other." If it were a bill by itself to change the establishment at Great Britain, everybody would agree, even the House of Representatives possibly would agree, if they sent us a bill by itself saying that hereafter the salary of the establishment at Great Britain should only be $14,000 or $10,000, or any other sum, and that the hire of an office should only be $500 or any other sum, if we did not agree to it that would be the end of it. But it seems to be imagined that because it is put into an appropriation bill—the very place it ought not to be, because it is impossible in an appropriation bill covering various branches of the service to have fair inquiry—the Senate must take it, hit or miss, right or wrong; that that is the true constitutional authority; and it is upon that ground that we disagreed.

How does that leave us? It leaves us in this attitude: The House of Representatives cannot be compelled—it is not obliged, so far as we are concerned—we have no right to demand and we do not demand that it shall vote a single dollar of the public money for any purpose that it does not choose to vote. If it refuses to vote anything for the foreign service, anything for the salary of the President or of the judges of the Supreme Court or any other officers, we cannot help it. It is no business of ours. We may attempt by a conference to persuade it, to appeal to its reason, and to induce it by reason to fulfill its constitutional duty; but, if it does not see it in that light, our mission is ended and it takes its own responsibility to that just public sentiment which over a large number of years is always correct and to that due preservation of the independence and purity of the Government by the independence of its several branches and refuses to appropriate if it sees fit. We cannot do anything about it. As I say, we have exhausted argument; we have exhausted experiment. There is nothing left to us, in my judgment, under the Constitution and under our sense of duty, but to say: "You will give no more money than this; very well, we accept it; but when you ask that we shall make a new law and declare that this money shall cover every branch of this service and shall pay every demand upon it, and that no person hereafter shall have any right to have any more, and that this mission and that consulate and the other shall be abolished, we have no right to accede to that for the sake of getting anything, unless we are satisfied that such accession is right." Why, Mr. President, taking the question as it is presented by the House of Representatives through its conferees and admitting, for the sake of trying their case, what is otherwise absurd, in violation of the language of the Constitution, in violation of the history of its formation, in violation of common sense and public security, to be true, still we should find ourselves, on their own ground, taking this to be a money bill, as they call it, in the strictest common-law and parliamentary sense; and if we followed out our theory as it is followed out in Great Britain, we should do exactly what the House of Lords would do on a similar occasion: we should have rejected on sight—that is the very phrase—rejected on sight every one of these amendments which change the law. In the time of Charles II the House of Commons undertook to imagine that on money bills in the English sense—call them revenue bills, if you please, about which there is no dispute they had a right to originate, and, more than our Constitution provides, had a right to say should not be altered—they had the right to put legislation and tack their bills, as the English phrase is, upon them in order to ride them through the House of Lords because the government could not go on without providing the supply bills and money bills, the taxes, &c., which usually in the same bills were provided as to their expenditure. What happened from that? After a little the House of Lords adopted a standing order, which exists to this day if I am not misinformed, to reject every provision in a money bill, without inquiry into its merits at all, that was of a legislative character, as we express it. They would not stop to ask, as we have stopped to ask the House conferees, whether the change in the salary of the mission to Great Britain was wise or unwise, was fair or unfair, was honest or dishonest, but it is their standing practice to refuse even to consider for a single moment any proposition of that kind. We have not insisted upon doing that, although, if the theory of the House were carried out as to their relations to what these gentlemen call money bills, very unadvisedly as I think, we should do the same thing, and then the result would be exactly the same as that which I have supposed; only in this instance we have asked the gentlemen on the part of the House to point out to us by fact and statistics and inquire why it is that these changes in the law that they propose ought to be made, and we are answered by the statement that there is a general time of public distress and a general time of necessity for economy. Well, sir, there is a general time of public distress in a certain sense, and there always ought to be a general time of economy. There is no time that is so prosperous that a government that expects to stand forever and be pure can afford to be otherwise than economical. It is not the business of any government that I know of, any government of ours, either state or national, to be otherwise than economical at any time. If the people have any money to spend, outside of the trust they repose in it, in luxury and enjoyment, it is their affair, and they can spend it in their private capacities; but when the time comes that the Republic is to engage in the business of spending money otherwise than economically, it will be a bad day for the Republic in my opinion, for it will lead to corruption in the greatest degree and to all the consequences that follow corruption. So, then, the real question is not whether we ought to be economical now or at any other time. We all ought to be; we all strive to be. It has not been reserved to this session of Congress to try to be economical. If members in the other branch will look into the history of legislation in the last ten years, they will find that both democrats and republicans in both Houses have earnestly devoted themselves in appropriation bills and in other bills affecting the public service to reduce expenditures to the lowest proper limit, and they have done it from time to time, and they are no doubt equally desirous to do it again.

But, Mr. President, economy has its limits. There is no ground for saying that economy shall be turned into robbery; there is no ground for saying if you are to employ a man to perform a certain duty in the public service that you will give him only half the money that is necessary to sustain him in performing that service and leave him to beg or steal for the residue. I hope there is no part of the people of the United States who are in favor of that sort of economy, as it is sometimes called. So the real question was taking these first missions whether there was any ground to believe at all that the just demand of the public duty to be done would be properly performed, prudently, economically, modestly, in the most rigid sense, for less than the sums named by existing law; and our honorable gentlemen representing the other House had no facts to offer. It was only a general impression that it was a good time to slice in the knife everywhere and trust to future inquiry to ascertain whether we had been committing a wrong or doing a right.

But, as I said, Mr. President, the thing is whittled down—to use a northwestern expression—it is really brought down to the disagreement of the two Houses, radical, earnest, decisive, on this simple question, whether it is the duty of the Senate, under the Constitution justly considered, to yield its judgment and to follow legislation proposed by the House of Representatives, without any reason, in changing existing laws, in reducing salaries, and abolishing places. The same principle of course would apply if it were reversed and the House of Representatives had demanded that we should increase salaries and provide new offices and new places, and then we should be told in the same way and in the same spirit "the Senate has no business to a conscience or a judgment or an intelligence of its own; the House of Representatives represent the people; they are the persons whose judgment alone is entitled to any weight." That is the point; and that being the point, I am myself in favor of considering before we agree to any new conference what course the Senate ought to take; and I appeal to my honorable friend from New Jersey to allow this matter to lie on the table until we can reflect upon it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Before the Senator from New Jersey yields to that I think some reply ought to be made to remarks that are indulged in from time to time on conference reports reflecting on the action of the House of Representatives. I think it is very unfortunate that there should be disagreements between the two Houses in reference to the appropriation bills, but they sometimes occur; they have occurred in the previous history of the country and they will occur again, I presume, in the future history of the country; but I do not think the occurrence of a disagreement should be made the occasion for a criticism on the part of one House in reference to the action of the other.

Now, in regard to this particular bill, I am not sure that I agree at all with the House of Representatives in reference to the payments to be made to our principal missions abroad; but I have no hesitation in expressing my opinion that there are many consulates and minor positions that could be abolished without any serious detriment to the country. But what I rose principally to say was that the House of Representatives is a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department, and as such is entitled to its judgment in reference to what shall be the measure of compensation paid foreign ministers and consuls as the Senate of the United States, and that because the House differs with the Senate that fact furnishes no ground for the severe criticisms that are frequently indulged whenever an occasion is presented by the report of a disagreement between the two Houses in reference to any of the appropriation bills.

The House of Representatives are not captiously striking for economy, as is represented.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator does not allude to me. I have not represented that they were captious about anything; far from it. I undertook to say, and I thought I did say so that nobody could misunderstand me, that the House of Representatives was perfectly entitled, according to its own judgment and absolutely independent of ours, to say that it will not appropriate anything if it wanted to; and I merely said, on the other hand, that the Senate was equally entitled to say on its conscience and judgment that it would not change the law till it could see a reason for doing so.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I am not charging the Senator from Vermont or any other Senator with using the word "captious;" but it cannot have escaped the attention of the Senate that the whole tenor of the debate has been a severe criticism on the action of the House of Representatives. That, I think, no one will deny. They have been held up as striking blindly and wildly for economy when there was no necessity. The Senator from Vermont will not deny that point. I think there is great necessity for economy, and I think that the House of Representatives has shown a commendable spirit in this regard. The people of the country are paying taxes to this Government, heavy and oppressive taxes, while the business interests of the country, it is admitted, are paralyzed to a very considerable extent.

It was said on the other side of the House the other day that the agricultural interests of the country were never more flourishing than at the present time. It happens to be my fortune to have some interest in some poor land. I know, therefore, from my own experience what is the condition of the agricultural interest. Your cereals to-day are not worth more than half what they were worth a few years ago; and while the crops may be as abundant as formerly, yet they are unremunerative because of the condition of the country, and because of the want of remuneration in the prices paid for agricultural products. I think there never was a time when there was greater oppression of the agricultural interest of the country than at the present time; and that is true of every other interest. It is true of the manufacturing interest; it is true of the commercial interest; and in this condition of affairs in this land it becomes the representatives of the people to look carefully to economy. The House of Representatives have only obeyed the high behests of the people they represent in seeking to economize as they have upon all the bills. They may have gone too far. I do not say they have not. I do not say that they have not made mistakes. "To err is human." But the conference committees ought to reconcile and adjust these differences without animadversion on the part of one House toward the other. In reference to the legislative provisions incorporated in this bill, I believe that that kind of legislation is vicious. I have always believed so, and since I have been in the Senate I have opposed measures of that kind; but the House of Representatives had before them the illustrious example that had been set for several years. The most obnoxious measures have been incorporated upon appropriation bills, and they have passed the Senate and passed the House of Representatives and become the law of the land without the severe criticism upon them which is now indulged in because the House of Representatives see proper on appropriation bills to determine the question of the amount to be paid to our consuls and ministers abroad.

Mr. President, I cannot and do not willingly sit still and hear these criticisms against the co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government when we believe they are actuated by a proper spirit of economy and a desire to relieve the people from the oppressions and burdens under which they have been laboring for some years.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, I agree with what was said by the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] as to the importance of our consular system to our commerce and the importance of our diplomatic system to the honor of the nation; and it is because I so fully appreciate the truth of all that he said that I as one member of the conference committee was reluctant to omit any expedient to prevent this bill from failing. I agree with what my friend from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has said, that no future conferees on the part of the Senate can make any more acceptable proposition than has been made, I do not care from which side of this Chamber you take them. We have exhausted our ingenuity in trying to accommodate this matter; for I take it for granted that no Senator can agree that the two legislative branches of this Government are not co-ordinate and equal. That is the point.

As to what my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] says about economy, we have offered to adopt just the House appropriations, to recede from every amendment increasing those appropriations, they receding from their amendments changing the laws; and that is rejected. Why, then, do I move that the Senate insist and ask another conference instead of adhering and terminating this dispute? For this reason: I believe that there is a better sentiment in the House of Representatives than has been represented on the conference committee, and I would give them this opportunity of having that better and truer sentiment of the House represented in another conference.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I heard of a Scotchman once who finding himself upon his death-bed was told that he must forgive his enemies, and he said if he must he would, but he left his curse to his son if he would forgive them. [Laughter.] Standing in the presence of a rule of courtesy which has heretofore and which I hope will hereafter animate and to a certain extent guide the intercourse of these two Houses, I am willing for one to refrain a little longer from putting on your record a vote adhering to the position the Senate has already taken upon this bill; but in order to be perfectly explicit and intelligible I want to say to the next committee of conference that the Senate shall appoint that if they do not in fact adhere to that very position I shall be disposed to leave anathemas to them hereafter or to pile them up at once.

Mr. SARGENT. We cannot hear the Senator.

Mr. HOWE. I say that although I am willing to forego a little longer the vote to adhere, I shall expect the next committee of conference in fact to adhere to the position which the Senate has already maintained, and that for two reasons, one of which I do not lay much stress upon. That one is that you are required to make reductions in salaries now appointed by law, which salaries I do not myself think are too high; and for that reason I do not wish the Senate to acquiesce in the demand made upon it. But then I know very well that you might reduce these salaries to the extent demanded, and yet you might maintain a sort of service; the country would not be ruined if you acquiesced in this demand, and so I do not care so much about this particular point. There is another reason more imperative than this, I think, why the Senate should not acquiesce in this demand, and that is the moment you do it you have destroyed the Senate. You have no Senate when you have acquiesced in this demand, no such Senate as the Constitution provides for, a co-ordinate body in the legislature. That Senate will not survive such a vote. We are told, in almost as many words as these, that unless you re-adjust certain salaries at a certain figure the appropriations now demanded by law shall not be made. It is always proper for either House of Congress to propose a re-adjustment of salaries, an increase or a decrease of salaries, and when any such proposition is made by one House or the other, it is always proper for the other House to consider the propriety of the new measure and acquiesce in it or reject it, as its judgment, and not as its fears, may direct; and that House or that Senator or that Representative who refuses to acquiesce in any such proposition always does so upon a certain responsibility; and that responsibility is that he may meet and will be likely to meet the rebuke of his constituents if his judgment does not coincide with theirs. Now, the House has proposed a re-adjustment of certain salaries in this bill. The Senate has already sufficiently indicated by its vote that its judgment does not coincide with this measure, does not approve of it. We have indicated that over and over again. We have made a record complete and perfect against ourselves. If our judgments mislead us, the evidence is complete; we can be arraigned at the bar of the people, and judgment can be demanded any day. I am ready to listen to that judgment myself. Having thus exposed our judgments, our defective judgments, laid those bare before the people, it seems to me the House is now practicing on our nervous system, seeing how far it can operate on our fears. Now we are told that unless our wills give way, no matter about your judgments, unless our wills give way and we assent to those salaries, we can have no appropriations. Well, sir, I hope the Senate will exhibit on this trying occasion, whatever may be said of its judgment, a sound nervous system. If we are afraid, I hope we shall not advertise that fear. If there is any cowardice here, let us keep it to ourselves, and not spread it on the record.

Mr. President, I think that if we were induced to acquiesce in a measure which our judgment did not approve by the threat that appropriations should not be made, the Senate would no longer exist as a co-ordinate body of the Legislature.

Mr. EATON. Has there been any such threat, or do you assume that there has been? Which?

Mr. HOWE. I perhaps assume it; I have not heard it in so many words.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose it would be improper to read from the debates and proceedings of the House of Representatives, and therefore my friend from Wisconsin cannot answer the question. But if he were allowed to answer the question, he could furnish materials to answer it and show that such a threat has been made.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the attitude of the House to be, no matter what its words may be, a threat. The law to-day tells the House of Representatives to appropriate so much money to each of these salaries. That is the law to-day; and they do not do it. They have a reason or they have not. What reason under Heaven can they assign but that they expect, by holding out and refusing to meet this duty, to compel the Senate to change these salaries, so that less money will be required? Their attitude is a threat, no matter what their language is. They might just as well hold a club up over the heads of the conference committee or over the heads of the Senate; it would be no more nor less a threat than is this action.

Now, sir, you and I know that when our Constitution was formed there was a great deal of difficulty in the convention about adjusting the precise measure of authority that each State should have in the new Government. They all saw at once that the absolute sovereignty of each of the States had got to be given up, that a new government was to be framed which upon certain subjects should be an authority supreme over that of any State. It was a very important question whether each State should have precisely the same authority in the new Government, or whether the authority of each State in the new Government should be in precise proportion to the number of its people; and to reconcile those provisions was a work of no little difficulty. You know how it was finally adjusted by a most ingenious compromise, the compromise being this: that in one House of Congress, in one branch of the legislative department, the measure of authority possessed by the States should be in precise proportion to the number of their people, and that in the other branch of the legislative department the measure of authority of the different States should be precisely equal. This happens to be that branch of the legislative department. Here the States have been accustomed to feel that they had the best security for their rights as States. I never was myself what is called a State-rights man, or politician, or statesman, or lawyer. I never saw anything in the right of a State any more sacred as such than the right of a man. I think myself that human rights are quite as sacred as political rights; but I never saw the hour when I would not stand by and defend every right which this Constitution creates, whether it is on behalf of a man or on behalf of a State. The men who made the Constitution did agree, if they agreed to anything, that in one branch of Congress each State should have the same number of representatives, and that no statute should be put upon your book unless that branch of Congress wherein the States were evenly and equally represented should agree to it. We are told now, at this late day, by the popular branch of Congress that appropriations must stop or that this branch of Congress must surrender its independent judgment; and strange to say, if I may be allowed to say so, that demand comes to us from that school of politics (I am glad to know, not representing all of them by any manner of means) which has heretofore made the loudest boast of being the champions of State rights. To-day, I think the man is the staunchest champion of the rights of States who stands up for the independence of that branch of the Legislature in which the States have an equal voice.

Therefore I shall be very sorry, Mr. President, if any committee of conference appointed by the Senate shall be found to shrink one inch from the attitude which I understand has been maintained in this great debate up to this hour.

Mr. BAYARD. Mr. President——

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. At the request of the Senator from Vermont I am perfectly willing to let the matter lie on the table. I do not want to interrupt the Senator from Delaware, however.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like it to lie on the table a short time, but not to interfere with my friend from Delaware if he wishes to speak.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to express in as few words as possible how sincerely I deprecate the tone of this debate upon the part of those who seem to object to the further proceeding of conference between the two Houses in relation to the differences upon this bill. It does seem to me that to meet a proposition for an amicable conference for the purpose of adjusting conscientious differences between the two co-ordinate branches of the legislative department of this Government, by an arraignment of motive, by a denunciation of intent, by a reference to political schools, is to say the least exceedingly unfavorable to that end for which conferences were designed and which I trust the present one may reach. I have been for the last two weeks a member of a conference committee on the part of the Senate, sincerely, ingenuously endeavoring to harmonize the views of the two branches upon an important bill. Had I entered that conference with any such suggestions on my mind as seem to exist in the mind of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin and others upon this broad subject of difference, I should have believed the task hopeless almost before we entered upon it. But I believe, as in all cases of human difference, the very best preparation that a man can make in his mind for success is to divest it of suspicion that wrong is intended either upon one side or the other, but that there shall be as a condition-precedent to any arrangement of this kind a very positive exhibition of mutual respect and good-will. Not only is a question of personal feeling, of mere party feeling, unjust and detrimental, but I submit it is both undignified and unworthy.

We are not here for a party end. We are not here for personal ends. We are here to legislate for a great country and for masses of people, much divided perhaps in local interest and certainly in individual sentiment. Here upon a broad bill, a money bill, supplying expenses for this common Government of our country, is it not possible that we shall treat it with the dignity and with the absence of all personal and party feeling which such a question calls for? I will say that if I cannot go upon a committee of conference except as a partisan, I will not go at all; I will ask to be excused; and I will plead my infirmity as the excuse; but believing that I can go upon committees to hear and judge fairly upon the merits of proposed differences, therefore I am willing to give my services, feeble though they be, to such an end.

Let me here say that we cannot in an instant suddenly and abruptly reverse and ignore the practice of these two Houses of Congress in regard to legislation of a general character upon appropriation bills for the last fifteen years at least. It will not do to say because the party sentiment of the two Houses was in accord, therefore that could be allowed under those circumstances as a method of legislation or as a principle of legislation which is not right when the two Houses differ in political sentiment. What is the result of such an argument? It is that the right or wrong, the expediency or the contrary, the justice or the contrary of legislation shall depend upon the accidental party sentiment of the relative branches of Congress. That will never do. We cannot say so. It is a matter of fact plainly and practically before us that for the first time in sixteen years the two parties relatively of the two Houses of Congress differ as to the majority of sentiment in each House. It could not be expected that the smooth flow of power which has passed on unchecked between members of the same party in the two Houses should not meet with some cheeck when for the first time in this long period a difference of party complexion arises between the two Houses. It cannot be that this difference of party complexion can be made the basis of a sound argument in favor of that being wrong today which you have admitted in the past to be right and proper. When I say admitted to be right and proper, I mean not without individual exception, I myself and perhaps others, perhaps the honorable Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Always.

Mr. BAYARD. I have been one of those who have constantly deprecated the ingrafting of general legislation upon a mere money bill. I have said so often that I have tired of my constant defeat on almost every measure which I have tried to support here; but I have not ceased to object to this practice. I have asked again and again that an appropriation bill should be in substance what it was in name—the appropriation of money to carry into effect existing laws; and yet what have we seen, or I may almost ask what have we not seen? What principle, what subject of general legislation has not been amended and touched under the form of appropriation laws? I have seen the question of evidence to be brought into courts of justice, invading principles well known to the common-law history of our country, entirely changed by an amendment to an appropriation bill. I have seen rights of liberty most dear under the Constitution and sacred in all history suspended by an amendment in an appropriation bill. In fact it would be difficult to find any subject of general legislation that to a greater or less degree has not been ingrafted upon appropriation bills by the two Houses during the last fifteen years. It is an unwise and vicious frame of legislation, but surely you are not to put an end to it without some degree of modification or notice. It was not to be presumed because a majority of the other House were suddenly discovered to be gentlemen of an opposite political party that therefore the whole custom which had hardened into law by acquiescence was suddenly to be put an end to. It certainly should be done with notification. As I have expressed in former times, I am exceedingly desirous that we should by clear and positive authority, by a joint rule or by an unwritten law of practice to be created, have the understanding that appropriation bills shall be money bills, that they shall be in fact what they are in name. We have in our own rules prohibitions upon amendments to appropriation bills, signifying a proper current of decision on this subject. We except amendments of different kinds unless they have the approval of some head of a Department or the recommendation of a standing committee. All those things are meant as restrictions upon the general flood of amendments that might rush in upon an appropriation bill and completely change its tone and character. I am very willing to see, and hope I may see a successful regulation adopted mutually by the two Houses for that purpose; but I submit with all respect, looking at the history of the legislation of these two bodies for the last fifteen years, that you should not announce now as a simple principle that which your constant practice has been to violate. Do not suddenly and abruptly make this change, and do not place it upon the ground beforehand that there is any intent to invade your privileges or your just duties and your obligations. I have not spoken nor do I propose to speak as to the expediency or otherwise of amendments that are proposed for legislation that may come from the other branch of Congress. They have their duties which they may exercise in the light of their consciences. I have mine, and propose to follow them with an equal dignity and I trust with an equal sense of right. Before a committee of conference had ever been asked upon the first appropriation bill that came at the present session from the House, expressions were made from the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] in which it seemed to me he stepped in advance, and hastened swiftly to meet some possible difference between the two Houses which had then not actually occurred. Before the bill was considered, before they had their errors, if errors they be, pointed out to them by the action of the Senate, they were arraigned for attempting to cripple the Government, or some such phrase of railing accusation was used. I then objected to that discussion. I thought it neither conducive to good results nor healthful to good legislation in any way.

In the present case we have differences, and those differences must be adjusted, I trust reasonably and with mutual respect. I do not think that the suggestion of threat or of overpowering the will of the Senate, or of overpowering the judgment of the Senate can properly be made. I have nothing to say nor do I care to look at what has been said by individuals in another branch of the Government upon the subject of this bill. I only feel that we have methods which I trust we shall pursue with dignity, and not only that but with something I think better for a good result, and that is the intent to settle these great Government measures upon a basis of sound economy to the Government, and of a mutually good understanding between the co-ordinate branches of the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I entirely agree to what the Senator has last said, that we should have true economy, and that there should be a due respect, a real respect, between the two branches of Congress. I feel quite sure that nothing I have said has been in opposition to that view. It is not a want of courtesy to the House of Representatives after three conferences, and where the question in dispute is reduced to one of constitutional principle and power for either House to say, "It is useless to confer any more; we have found out the precise point upon which one or the other of us must recede or we shall have no law." There is no want of respect in that course. The time must come some day when that point will be reached. If on this bill it had been a question of items, whether there should be so much for this branch of public expenditure and so much for another, and the difference between the conferees had been one of space, so to speak, the Senate saying one sum and the House another, where it was equally open to the discretion of both to have its own way, we might keep on conferring, although even then there must be an end to it some time.

Speaking not as to what has occurred in the other branch, for I have no right to do so and no disposition to do so, but speaking of what I have a right and it is my duty to speak of, as one of the members of the committee on the part of the Senate, what took place in the conference, which we are bound to report to the Senate, and the other conferees are bound to report to the House, I find that the question is what I have stated it to be, not as to whether there should be legislation on an appropriation bill. We have made no such point as that in the conference of which I have been a member. Of course we all deprecate it, as my friend does and as he knows I always have done, for I have uniformly resisted it; but in the present attitude of the question the Senate conferees have stated distinctly to the gentleman of the House, "We waive the question whether this legislation ought to be in an appropriation bill entirely; admit that it ought to be there just as much as if it were an independent bill;" and that certainly is the utmost extent to which anybody can admit it; put it on its true grounds of real merit or want of merit. Then the House conferees say, "We want to change the law in this particular on this bill." We say, "Very well; we will waive the objection to its being on this bill; what are your grounds for changing the law?" "Well, so and so, and so and so." The Senate conferees, looking over the reasons, feel compelled on their consciences to say that the proposition is entirely inadmissible. Their absolute duty is to say that they cannot agree to that proposition to change the law, because they do not see that there is either justice or true economy in it, all in perfectly good temper and good feeling, it being a mere intellectual comparison of facts and of reasons.

My friend, therefore, can have no ground to say that we are resisting any changes in the law because they are in an appropriation bill. Although we entertain the same sentiments that my friend does, we have taken care, in view of the circumstances he has alluded to, not to make any point about that, but to treat every one of these provisions providing for a new law just as we would treat it in a conference upon a bill for that object alone. I am sure my friend would not ask anything more.

Where are we then, Mr. President? We have come right down to the simple point, taking as a type the first change proposed in the House bill about the four great missions, as they are called. The House conferees and their predecessors have said, "This ought to be reduced from $17,500 to $14,000; our reasons for it are that there is a general necessity for economy." We admit that there is a general necessity for economy, but we say "There is a difference between economy and injustice, and it is not economy not to pay a public servant whom you employ what is absolutely necessary to the due discharge of his duties. If you can show us any reasonable ground to suspect even that the sum which the law now fixes is greater than is absolutely necessary for the due economical, prudent, modest discharge of his duties, then although it is in an appropriation bill, we will gladly accede and will make a change." When you come down to facts just as might be supposed in the way these things are carried on between the two Houses, (I am not criticising either House for it, it has always been done more or less,) we are not in a condition to get at any facts. We do not know what the cost of the rent of a modest place for an American minister in London is. We do not know how much it costs him in the most modest way to hire one or two or three servants to sweep out his kitchen and cook his oatmeal gruel, if he is to live upon that. We have no means of making the inquiry, and we propose to the other side, "We have no facts before us which enable us to do anything but guess, or jump in the dark; let us inquire; let us have a joint committee, and if on inquiry we do ascertain that any one of these sums is too large, we will save the money from this day." The House conferees say, "No, we will not do that." "What will you do?" we ask them. They say, "We will take the House bill just as we have passed it; we will give no more money or we will change the law." Then we say, "If that is your attitude, we will recommend that the Senate recede from every one of its proposals to carry the sums up to what the law now gives because it is your right, and we respect it, and your responsibility, and we respect it, to say whether you will appropriate anything or not, and you must judge for yourselves and we have no right otherwise than by persuasion to interfere with your judgment at all; we therefore will back out of our proposition to make the sums what the law requires and ask you to leave the law as it is until we can find out that it ought to be changed." They say, "No, you must change the law or we will not appropriate anything;" (that is the effect of it; that is not the language;) "you must take the bill as it is." What can we do then? What is the use of conferring any further? It has come down, as I believe, to a mere question of principle whether the Senate shall be compelled—I am not now speaking of coercion—by a sense of its duty to assent to changing laws that it finds no fact to justify it in doing in order that any appropriation shall be made to carry on the particular branch of Government mentioned in the bill. That is all there is to it; and we have had three conferences upon that question. The Senate conferees have not evinced any disposition to refuse to make any change for which even a fair probability of good ground could be offered, because it is on an appropriation bill; but when the change proposed seems to us to be utterly destitute of justice, or foundation, or economy, and we are then told by the House conferees "You must not only take the change as to money, but you must make a new law that shall make that the money that the law is to give for all time to come, until we find out that we are wrong in this case of ours," and added to that the statement of the House conferees that on their construction of the Constitution it is our duty to yield to their judgment, it appears to me that there is an end of any advantage in a conference and an end without any disrespect to the House of Representatives because every body will see on looking into the parliamentary law that it is no disrespect to either House for the other at any time in its judgment to say, "We have considered this subject so perfectly that we must adhere on such cardinal points as this to our opinion, for everything is involved."

That is the state of the case, and I think my friend, therefore, is not justified in intimating, as I infer he did in his observations, that there had been anything of party, anything of want of courtesy, anything of disrespect or of obstinacy on the part of the Senate conferees in respect to this matter. I am glad to see (and I should not have referred to it at all but for what my friend has said) that although the Senate conference committee was made up of different parties, there was the most perfect unanimity between us in respect of our ultimate views and in respect of the reasons that we gave for them, and that this conference, which has now been spoken of, instead of being disrespectful to either House, was carried on under all the forms and in the substance of the utmost courtesy. It is a question of radical difference of opinion as to the rights of the two Houses in regard to changing laws or carrying out laws that involve expenditures for this purpose.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, when I was on the floor just now I assigned such reasons as occurred to me why I thought the committees, all of them which may hereafter represent the Senate in conferences with the other branch of the Legislature, should adhere to the position which the Senate has already assumed. I spoke without reflection, and may or may not have assigned proper reasons. Such reasons as I did assign of course are open to criticism. The Senator from Delaware, speaking immediately after, felt called upon to animadvert upon the spirit in which I spoke, without adverting at all to the argument I used or attempted to use. I was not paying any particular attention just at the time to the spirit in which I spoke. It might have been well or ill conceived. I think if my friend from Delaware will, however, consult the Constitution, he will see that his jurisdiction is rather limited to replying to facts, correcting facts, correcting reasoning, which may be used here in the Senate, and whenever he will perform that office for me he will not only oblige me but he will oblige my constituency in the State of Wisconsin. I think he will agree himself that when it comes to the spirit or the temper in which I speak, he had better leave that to the State of Wisconsin to correct. They may or may not have different views from his. I did not understand him to reply to a single one of the suggestions I made use of; I do not know but that he did; I did not say a word about the practice of putting general legislation on appropriation bills. I do not think it the best place in the world for general legislation, but I know nothing in your Constitution, nothing in your rules, which prohibits it. Therefore I did not make one single word of objection against such legislation being proposed on any of these bills; and I did not dwell a minute by the watch on the other point that the legislation the House proposed was not satisfactory to me and had not yet been satisfactory to the Senate. The Senator, however, did not take occasion to say that I was not correct in assuming that there was an attempt to dragoon the Senate into legislation which it did not approve. I did assume that. I said we ought not to acquiesce in it. If I was wrong in that, if the assumption is groundless, I should be glad to have it pointed out; or if I was wrong in contending that we ought not to acquiesce in that attempt, let that be pointed out; but I did not for a moment say that we should resist this legislation simply because it was proposed on an appropriation bill. I was struck with the use which the Senator made of that particular feature of the case. With his usual candor he admitted that all such legislation is wrong and has been wrong just so far and just so long as republicans have indulged in it; and with his usual candor he did not admit that it was wrong while it was practiced by a party not the republican party. I think myself it is rather injudicious and irregular. It is only to be justified, if at all, by exceptional circumstances when it is proposed either by one party or the other; but I take no sort of exception to its being attempted on this bill, although it is not attempted by the party that I voted with last fall and is attempted by a party which I have not determined to vote with next fall.

Mr. MORTON. The point involved, I understand to be, and I think it ought to be very clearly expressed, that the salaries of ministers, consuls, and other officers are fixed by general laws, laws that will remain for all time unless amended, laws that do not expire at the end of the year. The office of an appropriation bill, as I understand it, is to make appropriations to meet the requirements of existing laws, and an appropriation bill runs but one year. If either House should insist in an appropriation bill on changing the general law, either to increase or diminish a salary, and say to the other House, "Unless you agree to this change of the general law we will make no appropriation at all, we will stop the wheels of the Government," I understand that to be coercion. That is what in law is called duress. It is an argument not of persuasion, but of danger to the Government, a threat to stop the wheels of government. If both Houses agree to make a change of the general law in an appropriation bill, it may be improper legislation, bad practice, I agree, but still there is no coercion about it; while if one House changes the general law and says to the other House, "If you do not agree to the change of the general law there shall be no appropriation at all, the foreign ministers shall not be paid at all, the consuls shall not be paid at all, unless you agree to this change," that is coercion. That is unconstitutional, and no free government can be carried on upon that principle.

Mr. EATON. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. Is such a change of the law unconstitutional when the two Houses agree politically and undertake to coerce another branch of the Government, the President of the United States?

Mr. MORTON. We cannot coerce the President. The President may refuse to sign the bill. We can never tell in advance whether he will sign a bill or not. Both Houses always have to take the risk in regard to a bill, whether the President will sign it or not. But I do not wish any escape from the precise point. If both Houses agree to the change of the general law, there is no coercion about it; but if one House refuses and the other House says, "If you do not agree to it, we will have no appropriations; we will call home our foreign ministers; we will break up the diplomatic and consular service," that, I take it, is coercion; it is unconstitutional; and a Government like this cannot be carried on upon that principle. I am not saying that the House of Representatives has put itself in that position, but I say, if it does put itself in that position, it violates the fundamental principle of a government consisting of two Houses.

Mr. WHYTE. Mr. President, the statements which have been made by the Senator from Vermont induce to me to ask the Senator from New Jersey to let us have a vote at this time upon his motion, and not to withdraw it or to let the report be laid upon the table without action. It is very clear to my mind that it is our duty to resort to another conference committee on this bill, and if necessary still another freer and fuller conference with the other House, in order that we may by a change of the component parts of those conference committees finally reach some report which will be acceptable to both Houses. We have had three conferences, I believe, on this bill. That is nothing remarkable between parliamentary bodies. After three conferences parliamentary bodies have ordered free and full conferences, enlarging the powers of the conference committee with a view of reconciling the disagreements of the two bodies.

I believe that the Senate is actuated by a spirit of patriotism when it desires to hold in its hands its own constitutional power of reasoning, of deciding, of determining what it shall do in regard to any matter of legislation which requires the concurrent action of the two bodies. I believe the House of Representatives is actuated by the same patriotic impulses. They have a perfect right to press with ardor, to press with firmness, any views which they may entertain as to the legislation which will conduce most to the public good. They have the right to resort to all those parliamentary expedients which are recognized as proper and in due form to bring about a result which will be agreeable to their notions of right and wrong. We have the same right to maintain, by all parliamentary expedients, our views. But looking to the fact that this is an appropriation bill, a bill providing the means for maintaining in foreign lands our representation in honor and with credit to ourselves, we ought to go as far as it is possible to reconcile the differences between the two Houses and come to some conclusion which will be fruitful of a result honorable to both branches of the Legislature.

I do not like to hear Senators speak of this mode of legislation—that is, of ingrafting upon appropriation bills certain measures of legislation and sending them from one House to the other—as being improper and unwise, and when one House insists upon it that it is a threat that the appropriation bill shall not pass if the other House does not accede to the wishes of the House putting such legislation upon the appropriation bill. It has been a common expedient upon the part of legislative bodies time out of mind, whether the Houses were reconciled in political sentiment or not, whenever one House had a measure which might be called a pet measure of the majority of that body, for that House to ingraft it upon a bill appropriating public money for the regular uses of the Government for the very purpose of insuring its adoption by the other House. That has been the very object of it, and where it has not succeeded, where the two Houses have not been agreed upon it, the legislation has often failed. The Senate will well remember a case in which the incipient republican party left for us an example in regard to this sort of legislation. Do we not all know that in 1856 the House of Representatives ingrafted upon the Army appropriation bill a provision that the Army should not be used in the Territory of Kansas; and do we not know that the House stood upon that, in spite of the refusal of the Senate to accept that provision in the law? What was the result? Both Houses adjourned without passing a bill for keeping the Army in active motion and sustaining it in its efficiency.

Mr. HARVEY. I think the Senator from Maryland is mistaken in that statement. I think that the House ultimately receded from its position on that bill.

Mr. WHYTE. No; I have read the message of the President of the United States recalling Congress after it had adjourned without passing any Army appropriation bill at all. The House of Representatives then, with the republican party in its incipiency, before it had thrown off its swaddling-clothes and become the great power that we have since seen it in this country, planted in a bill for the pay of the officers and soldiers of the Army of the United States a piece of legislation preventing the President from using that Army in the Territory of Kansas, and both Houses adjourned without passing the bill. The President convened Congress again, and on the 31st of August the bill passed both Houses without the proviso that had been put upon it by the House of Representatives.

I will cite another memorable example. In 1865 Hon. Henry Winter Davis, then one of the leaders of the great party in power in this country, having a majority in both branches of the Legislature, put upon the bill for the sundry civil expenses of the Government, an appropriation bill, a proviso that no more citizens of the United States should be tried by court-martial in States where the courts of the United States were in full operation. What was the result of that? Why was it put on? It was put on, on the principle I have stated, to insure its passage through the Senate of the United States. That is not all. When the conference committee came together—and I have in my eye one of the Senators who was a conferee at that time—they agreed, if I remember correctly, on every disagreement except the one in regard to the trial by court-martial. The report was made to both Houses that the conferees had agreed upon every question that had led to the conference except upon the provision requiring trials before the courts where citizens were arrested. Let us see what Mr. Davis said about it:

> Under these circumstances, it remained for a majority of the House committee to determine between the great result of losing an important appropriation bill, or, after having raised a question of this magnitude touching so nearly the right of every citizen to his personal liberty and the very endurance of republican institutions, and to insure its consideration fastened it on an appropriation bill, to allow it to be stricken out as a matter of secondary importance. The committee thought that their duty to their constituents, to the House, and to themselves would not allow them to provide for any pecuniary appropriationsat the expense of so grave a reflection on the fundamental principles of the Government.—Speeches and Addresses of H. Winter Davis, of Maryland, page 552.

There was Mr. Davis's view of that case. He put it upon the bill to insure its passage through the Senate. The Senate then was composed of the same party in its majority as the House. It refused to pass the bill. The House refused to recede, and Congress adjourned in 1865 without passing the sundry civil appropriation bill at all. Who got up here then and talked about a threat from the House of Representatives? Who got up here and said it was an outrage that the House should demand that the Senate should adopt legislation or give the Senate the alternative of no appropriation at all? It is not a threat upon the part of the House when the friends of the majority here assert that they consider a matter of such importance that they would rather adjourn without passing the appropriation bill than to pass the bill without the legislation which they had ingrafted upon it being adopted by the Senate. The statement of any conferee without the action of the House of Representatives ought not to be taken as any indication of what the House will do after proper discussion and reasoning upon the part of a new conference committee. If the House of Representatives had insisted and re-appointed the same conferees as on the last committee of conference, you might presume that they meant to stand upon what they had previously said; but we have yet taken no action. The papers are here with us now. I rose for the purpose, and solely for the purpose of inducing, as far as I may be able to induce, the Senate to support the motion of the Senator from New Jersey to appoint a new conference committee and give the House through another committee, changed in its component elements, if you please, an opportunity of reconciling the differences which exist between the two Houses. It is our duty to leave no stone unturned to pass the bill. I appeal to Senators let no feeling of dignity in regard to our rights, let no feeling that we have done much prevent us from doing more to bring together the two Houses upon this all-important bill; let not foreign nations look upon us, the two Houses of the Congress of the United States, in this centennial year disagreeing upon a question of salaries in regard to our foreign ministers, and put ourselves in the position of adjourning, leaving it to the Executive to recall our foreign ministers from their stations abroad to their homes in this country. I, for one, shall leave nothing undone on my part to reconcile my friends to some bill which can receive the sanction of both the Houses of Congress.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, at the request of the Senator from Maryland [Mr. WHYTE] and with the acquiescence of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS,] I hope that the vote will now be taken, and I am free to say that I hope the Senate will insist and ask another conference. I think it is wisest; I think it is most courteous; and I for one am not unwilling to intrust the constitutional rights and powers of the Senate to any conferees that may be selected from either party.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments and ask for another committee of conference. The question is on that motion.

The motion was agreed to; and, by unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee.

JONATHAN WHITE.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. A bill was called up by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. OGLESBY] which was not at the desk at the time but is now found. The Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] yielded to that bill.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of Jonathan White was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jonathan White, of Minnesota, $55.40, illegally paid to the United States land officers at Redwood Falls, Minnesota, under a wrong construction of the tree-culture act.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the Washington Monument bill. I have examined the amendments and I move that we agree to them.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 982) providing for the completion of the Washington Monument.

The amendments of the House are:

On page 1, line 5, strike out "one" and insert in lieu thereof "two," so as to make the amount appropriated $200,000; and after the word "dollars," in line 6, insert "payable in four equal annual installments;" and strike out all after the word "consideration," in line 25, down to and including the word "monument," in line 26, and insert "of the sum herein appropriated: Provided, That nothing herein shall be so construed as to prohibit the said society from continuing in organization for the purpose of soliciting and collecting money and materials from States, associations, and the people in aid of the completion of the monument, and acting in an advisory and co-operative capacity with the commission hereinafter named until the completion and dedication of the same."

In line 2, page 2, strike out the word "and," and after the word "Capitol," in the same line, insert "the Chief Engineer of the United States Army and the first vice-president of the Washington National Monument Society."

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the amendments be concurred in. I have examined them; they are apparent on their face; and I do not see any great objection to them.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from Ohio the purport of this? I hardly understand it. I believe this appropriates $100,000 more than the old bill. Am I right in that?

Mr. SHERMAN. It appropriates $200,000 in four yearly payments, $50,000 a year. I think it is rather slow, but probably we had better agree to it. Then it leaves in existence the old organization or corporation merely for the purpose of gathering subscriptions. The members of the House think they may get money in that way.

Mr. MORRILL. Does the Senator from Ohio think we shall find that a very fruitful source of revenue?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think we ought to do it; it is a small business; but they believe the people of the United States are willing to give a little more. I do not believe much in the amendments, but I think we had better agree to them.

The amendments were concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole. The yeas and nays were ordered on concurring in the amendment and no quorum voted. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The CHIEF CLERK. The first amendment is to strike out in line 12 the word "seventy-five" and insert "one hundred;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of the harbor at Buffalo, New York, $100,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. I am paired on this vote with the Senator from West Virginia, [Mr. DAVIS.] If he were present I do not know how he would vote on this amendment; but I shall abstain from voting, as he is not present.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Dorsey, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Sargent, Sherman, Wadleigh, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, McDonald, Merrimon, Morrill, Robertson, Saulsbury, and Wallace—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Maxey, Oglesby, Patterson, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, and Whyte—34.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole is in line 18, to strike out "two" and insert "six;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of the harbor at Oak Orchard, New York, $6,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was in line 24, to strike out "two hundred" and insert "three hundred and fifty;" so as to make the clause read:

For removing obstructions in the East River and Hell Gate, New York, $350,000.

The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was in line 39, to strike out "five" and insert "two;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of the harbor at Marquette, Michigan, $2,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the committee—the thing has been hanging so long now that I do not remember about it—the grounds of this amendment. We are now coming along to what was involved in the old discussions. All the amendments that the Committee on Appropriations reported to strike out will have to be moved afresh, of course, as the Committee of the Whole refused to strike them out. I should like all the information that can be got from the reports of the engineers and the inquiries of the committee on this subject.

Mr. ALLISON. As to this particular harbor the engineer recommended a considerably larger sum. I do not remember the exact sum, though I could get it in a few moments from the reports. The House bill appropriated $5,000. That is not enough to enter upon any particular improvement of this harbor at Marquette, and it is more than necessary to keep it in repair. Therefore the committee simply recommended $2,000, a sum sufficient to keep this harbor in repair until such time as a sufficient appropriation can be made to go on with the improvement.

I think I may as well call attention now as at any other time to the fact that the Senate is still progressing according to the modes adopted when this bill was last under consideration, namely, agreeing with the Committee on Appropriations in instances where the appropriations are increased and disagreeing where the appropriations are diminished. I must submit to Senators that if this process is to continue a great while those who desire to have their harbors or their rivers improved will find that instead of securing the object they desire that object will be postponed for another year.

I am perfectly willing, however, having charge of this bill, to go on and test the sense of the Senate upon each particular amendment, and I desire to give notice that I intend to test the sense of the Senate on every amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations before this bill shall have been concluded.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why not move to recommit it, and have the committee reconsider the subject and bring it down somewhat?

Mr. ALLISON. I would make the motion to recommit if I thought any considerable portion of the Senate would favor a recommittal or would favor the report when the committee shall have acted on this bill again.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Try it.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. If the Senator from Iowa will permit, I will make the motion that this bill be recommitted to the committee, and I wish to state a few of the reasons why I make that motion.

My hope is that the amount may be limited to $5,000,000, but I have no doubt the committee would do that without instructions. I have been satisfied for some time that the bill has finally got into a shape in which it ought not to pass. There are appropriations in it which ought not to be made; there are appropriations which are too large for the particular locality in which they are granted considering the condition of the country; and the bill itself as a whole appropriates too much money to receive, in my opinion, the public approbation. I am perfectly well satisfied that this committee has labored with fidelity and most conscientiously to produce a bill that would meet the concurrence of the Senate. I believe there is a general disposition among the Senators from all the States to conciliate and consent to a reduction that will bring the amount of the bill within a reasonable compass. I believe, if the time can be taken from this until Monday morning, vastly more progress will be made in the passage of this bill than can be made by sitting here for a week with the present bill as it stands. I am satisfied that, if the bill be referred back to the committee, by next Monday or Tuesday at the farthest the committee will be able to produce a bill that will meet with general concurrence, which will scarcely lead to discussion, and one which will be satisfactory to the country. For that reason I submit the motion to recommit.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am in favor of judicious appropriations for the improvement of the rivers and harbors of the country. I am perfectly satisfied that this bill cannot become a law, and therefore I shall favor the recommittal to the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe that is the only way to get any bill.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not see my way clear as a member of the Committee on Appropriations to report the bill back in much better shape than it was originally reported from the committee. The committee went over this bill carefully, and I think conscientiously, and they struck out from the House bill items which they thought were improperly in it. Some of those items seemed to be glaringly improper, some of them perhaps doubtful. I do not mean to assume that the judgment of the committee should be necessarily the judgment of the Senate; but the Senate passed upon amendment after amendment in Committee of the Whole proposed by the Committee on Appropriations, and disagreed with us. Unfortunately I was absent from the Senate by sickness, and was not able to add my vote to sustain the action of the committee at that time, and I would like to make the suggestion that if this bill goes back to the committee again, unless there is something that has enlightened us in the debates of the Senate—and I only speak for myself—we can do very little more than report the bill back as we did before, and as it is really ow before the Senate, if we act on these amendments in detail, as we are compelled to do on any amendments reported from the committee.

I shall not vote against the recommital, provided that seems to be the deliberate judgment of the Senate, because it may perhaps be a way of facilitating business; but I should like to make a suggestion, that after having passed upon the amendments made in Committee of the Whole, either adopting or rejecting them, then we take up upon the motion of the Senator having charge of the bill the different amendments which were originally recommended by the Committee on Appropriations and see if the judgment of the Senate has changed since the other day when all those amendments were rejected. I think we can find a great many things which can be struck out of the House bill, and my impression is that the Senate is now satisfied that in the shape which the bill has assumed it amounts to a monstrosity, and that the only way to get it back to a shape which will be just to the Treasury and just to the public interests would be to strike off many things which we refused to strike off the other day on the recommendation of the committee. Why would it not be economy of time, before recommitting the bill, to pursue this course; act first on any amendments made in Committee of the Whole and then move again the amendments seriatim that were recommended by the Committee on Appropriations and see if the judgment of the Senate has changed on that matter? That is certainly a direct and a practical way to deal with the subject, and I suggest it would be better than to send the bill back to the committee to be detained for a number of days and then brought back in a new shape, where we shall be compelled to do this thing finally.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the motion to recommit by adding thereto the words "with instructions to report the bill amended so that the gross sum appropriated shall not exceed $5,000,000.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I accept the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Michigan accepts the amendment. The question is on the motion to recommit with the instructions proposed.

The motion was agreed to.

OSAGE LANDS IN KANSAS.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the House bill, No. 3625, for the sale of the Osage ceded lands, which has been before under consideration by the Senate; and I think it will take but a few moments to conclude it. It is a matter of great importance to a considerable number of my constituents.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Kansas moves to take up House bill No. 3625.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to substitute for that House bill No. 58.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Illinois is not in order. The motion is to take up House bill No. 3625.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS to strike out section 8 of the bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I move to postpone this bill and take up House bill No. 58, to equalize bounties.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that the motion be divided.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator from Illinois is aware that I am friendly to the measure that he desires to bring before the Senate; but I appeal to him to allow this other bill to be first acted upon which has received the consideration of the Senate in two morning hours. It is very nearly concluded. The Senator from Vermont has moved an amendment upon which I am willing to take the sense of the Senate; and upon the conclusion of that bill I shall with great pleasure assist the Senator from Illinois in taking up his bill.

Mr. LOGAN. I am very unfortunate as to getting the floor, because other people are quicker than I am. I should like to have a vote on the bounty bill for this reason: I believe there is a majority of the Senate in favor of it, but for some reason or other I have never been able to get it before the Senate, and if the same kind of tactics be followed I shall never be able to get it up. Hence, whenever I have an opportunity, I propose to ask the Senate to take it up. I ask now that the Senate take the vote whether or not the bounty bill shall be taken up and all prior orders laid aside.

Mr. MORTON. I am favorable to the disposition of the bill of the Senator from Kansas; but, from what I know of it, it will take all this afternoon if it goes on. It is a question of local interest, however. The bill referred to by the Senator from Illinois is one of general interest, I may say national interest; it is one of political interest. The consideration of it has been baffled for a long time, and it seems to me it ought not now at this late hour of the session to be required to give way to any local measure, whatever may be the merits of that measure. I hope therefore that the motion made by the Senator from Illinois will be carried. If this measure is put off to-day, the impeachment comes on on Monday and will last we know not how long, perhaps last to the day of adjournment, and we may give up the bill to which the Senator from Illinois refers. I think we cannot very well consent not to have that bill considered this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois moves to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill (H. R. No. 58) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union. The Senator from Vermont asks a division of the question. The first question will be on postponing the bill called up at the instance of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LOGAN called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WRIGHT. I wish to say one word before the vote is taken. I have voted every time the proposition has been made to take up the bill which the Senator from Illinois has in charge in favor of taking it up. The Senate has determined by its vote to take up the bill called up by the Senator from Kansas. While that is a local bill it has nevertheless been discussed several times here, and I think is generally understood, and though local it is one of very great importance to the settlers upon the lands named. I think it would be very gross injustice to vote to postpone that bill over the present session.

Now, I suggest to my friend from Illinois, as I want to vote for taking up his bill, that I think it but fair that the bill which has been called up and taken up by a vote of the Senate should be disposed of, as I believe it can be; and I think it would be better, everything considered, that it be not antagonized. I think we can get that bill out of the way, and not call on the friends of the bill of the Senator from Illinois to vote against taking it up because of their wish to dispose of the other measure. I am friendly to the Senator's proposition, as I have voted uniformly with him; but I think he will expedite the bill in that way. I shall be compelled to vote for continuing the consideration of the bill of the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. LOGAN. In reply to the Senator from Iowa I have only to say that I know he feels favorable to the bounty bill, but the special bill in reference to Osage lands was crowded in at the very time I was trying to get up the bounty bill; and I have tried several different times. One time I was beaten because it required a two-thirds vote; next time I was defeated when I asked the Senate merely to let the bill be read and have the amendments of the committee agreed or disagreed to. That was defeated by the morning hour expiring and the regular order being called up. So it has been defeated every time. I know but one way to get the bill before the Senate with the hostility there is to it, and that is to persist in trying to get it before the Senate. I deem it my duty to ask every time I have an opportunity for a vote, whenever I can get a vote that will take it up. If the Senate refuse to take it up, that is their business and I have nothing to say. They have a right to take up any proposition they please. The reasons given by the Senator from Iowa are good to him, but the same reasons do not apply to me. I have this bounty bill in charge, am responsible for it, and it is my duty to try to get it before the Senate, and therefore I shall decline to withdraw my motion and I ask that the yeas and nays be taken.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conkling, Dawes, Dorsey, Ferry, Hamlin, Howe, Key, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Oglesby, Spencer, and West—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Christiancy, Cockrell, Eaton, Edmunds, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Merrimon, Morrill, Norwood, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Stevenson, Wallace, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Davis, Dennis, Frelinghuysen, Goldthwaite, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Paddock, Patterson, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Windom—24.

So the motion of Mr. LOGAN was not agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] to strike out section 8, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered. The section will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, for the time being, to ascertain and determine the amount of costs and necessary expenses incurred in prosecuting the two suits commenced in the name of the United States against the Leavenworth, Lawrence and Galveston Railroad Company and the Missouri, Kansas and Texas Railroad Company in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, for the purpose of testing the validity of the title to said lands claimed by said railroad companies, and the costs and expenses of prosecuting said cases in the Supreme Court of the United States; said expenses to include the fees justly due to the attorneys retained at the instance of the settlers on said lands, with the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States; that, after determining the amount of costs and expenses as aforesaid, the Attorney-General shall certify the said amount, and to whom due, to the Secretary of the Interior; and the Secretary of the Interior shall pay to the parties entitled thereto the sum so allowed and certified to, as aforesaid, out of the proceeds arising from fifteen cents per acre on the sale of said lands.

Mr. WRIGHT. Would it be in order to move an amendment to the section?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would.

Mr. WRIGHT. I offer the following as a substitute for the section:

That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, for the time being, to ascertain and determine the amount of the reasonable fees justly due to the attorneys retained at the instance of the settlers on said lands with the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States in the prosecution of the suits against the railroad companies herein named in the circuit courtof the United States for the district of Kansas and the Supreme Court of the United States, for the purpose of testing the validity of the title to said lands claimed by the railroad companies, and that after determining the amount of said fees the Attorney-General shall certify the sum, and to whom due, to the Secretary of the Interior; and the said Secretary of the Interior shall pay to the parties entitled thereto the sums so allowed and certified as aforesaid out of the proceeds arising from fifteen cents per acre on the sale of their lands.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear that explained.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the object of this section is to provide for the payment of the fees of the attorneys who were retained by the settlers upon the recommendation of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Attorney-General never made any such recommendation.

Mr. WRIGHT. If he did not, that would raise a different question. I am assuming from the language of this section that there was such authority given and that they were properly retained.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to correct him about that? There is no dispute about what the fact is.

Mr. WRIGHT. It does not make any difference to my point whether there is any dispute about the fact or not. The section as it stands, as I think, contemplates the payment, or the settlement, or the auditing of something else than the fees of these attorneys, or at least the language of the section is such that something else may be included. Now I propose, as I learn from the Senator having the bill in charge, that he does not understand it to include anything else than the fees of the attorneys and does not design that it shall include anything else, to make the language such that it shall be put beyond all question. The section as it stands provides—

That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States for the time being to ascertain and determine the amount of costs and necessary expenses incurred in prosecuting the two suits commenced in the name of the United States against—these railroad companies not only in the circuit court of the United States but in the Supreme Court of the United States as well. That mentions "costs and necessary expenses incurred in prosecuting these two suits" in both courts:

Said expenses to include the fees justly due to the attorneys.

If it is intended to apply alone to the fees of the attorneys, then it is better to say so in words, because as the section stands it would include more than the fees of the attorneys. If it is not intended to pay anything, that is a different question; but if it is intended to pay the fees of attorneys alone, it ought to say so specifically.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. President, what we need, I think, is an exact statement of the facts relating to the employment of these attorneys. If they were employed by any officer of the United States authorized to make the employment, then the Government of the United States should meet the expense; but if these persons were employed by the settlers, and the officers of the United States Government merely tolerated them in some form in the conduct of this suit, I do not see how the Congress of the United States should be called upon to interfere for the protection of the attorneys. I understand also that the price of the lands by the first section is advanced fifteen cents per acre to meet this expense; that without this obligation which is recognized in the eighth section the principle on which the price is fixed would dictate that it should be $1.25 an acre instead of $1.40. That is to say, by the power we have we are to exact from all these settlers who own or make claim to something like nine hundred thousand acres of land the sum of fifteen cents per acre to defray the expenses of this lawsuit. I confess I for one am unwilling to force such an arrangement upon the settlers. If the attorneys entered into an agreement with these settlers to prosecute these claims, let us do our duty. If we are bound by legislation to allow these settlers to have the lands for $1.25 an acre, let that price be fixed in the law, and let the settlers do what they have agreed to, pay the attorneys a reasonable compensation for the service they have performed, whatever it is. If the fact is that the Government of the United States is in no way responsible to these attorneys, but that the relation of client and attorney is between these attorneys and the settlers, let the pay be exacted of the employer, not make the Government of the United States an intermediate party with power to enforce a payment of this, as it would seem to me pretty large fee.

As the matter presents itself to my mind now, I think we should strike out the eighth section, and change the price from $1.40 to $1.25 an acre. Of course if we exact $1.40 per acre and take fifteen cents from these settlers, both attorneys and settlers will naturally look to the Government of the United States to meet the claim the attorneys make, and there would then be the equity resting on the Government to meet that claim. I would avoid that trouble, and put the land at just what it should be put under the statute, unless there is a legal obligation resting on us to do something else.

Mr. INGALLS. As there may be some Senators present who were not in the Chamber when this bill was last under discussion, I will make a brief narration of the condition in which this land now is found, and in doing so will answer the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts.

By a treaty made in 1825 the Great and Little Osage Indians were assigned a very large tract of land, a portion of which lay within what are now the boundaries of the State of Kansas. In 1865 another treaty was made between the Great and Little Osage Indians and the United States Government, which was proclaimed in 1867, under which the Osage Indians ceded to the United States Government a tract of land fifty miles long by thirty wide within the limits of their original reservation, which is known as the Osage ceded land. The Government of the United States assumed the sale of those lands, and agreed that out of the moneys arising from their disposition $300,000 should be placed to the credit of the Osage Indians and the remainder of the fund arising from the sale of the lands should be placed to the credit of the general civilization fund for the benefit of all the Indians upon the continent, including the Osages. After this land thus became the property of the United States Government on the 10th of April, 1869, the following joint resolution became a law:

A resolution enabling bona fide settlers to purchase certain lands acquired from the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians.

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That any bona fide settler residing upon any portion of the lands sold to the United States, by virtue of the first and second articles of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867, who is a citizen of the United States or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be, and hereby is, entitled to purchase the same in quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at the price of $1.25 per acre, within two years from the passage of this act, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior: Provided, however, That both the odd and even numbered sections of said lands shall be subject to settlement and sale as above provided: And provided further, That the sixteenth and thirty-sixth sections in each township of said lands shall be reserved for State school purposes in accordance with the provisions of the act of admission of the State of Kansas: Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed in any manner affecting any legal rights heretofore vested in any other party or parties.

In order to understand the relations of the railroad companies to this tract of land and the subsequent suits that were prosecuted to determine their title, it is necessary for me to state that on the 3d of March, 1863, the Congress of the United States granted to the State of Kansas certain lands in aid of the construction of certain railroads running from the Kansas River south through the State of Kansas. Their projected route and their ultimate construction ran through this Osage ceded tract of land diagonally, the two lines intersecting about the center of the tract. The question arose whether or not this grant of land to the State of Kansas in 1863 became operative within this tract of Indian lands after the title became extinguished by the treaty of 1867. The Secretary of the Interior held that the grant to the State of Kansas and in favor of these railroad corporations became operative and attached within what was known as the tract of Osage ceded lands; and it was to test that question, whether the decision of the Secretary of the Interior was correct or not, that the suit was originally brought in the circuit court of the United States for the State of Kansas, and there decided in favor of the United States Government, to the effect that the grant did not become operative, which was subsequently taken on appeal to the United States Supreme Court, there argued at the October term, 1875, and affirmed by a decision announced in April of the present year. By that decision the Supreme Court declared that the grant to the railroad companies did not become operative in this tract, that the decision of the Secretary of the Interior was wrong, that the land was the property of the United States Government, and that therefore it was subject to the provisions of the joint resolution of April 10, 1869, which will be found in volume 16 of the Statutes at Large, under the terms of which any bona fide settler residing upon these lands which were secured by virtue of the treaty of 1865 was authorized to purchase any portion of the lands, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, within two years from the passage of the resolution, at $1.25 per acre. The present bill simply provides that they shall go on and complete their purchase, the time having expired and the decision of the Supreme Court being that the rights of the railroad companies did not attach to the tract about which this joint resolution was passed.

Mr. THURMAN. Does it only affect the time?

Mr. INGALLS. It authorizes persons who were bona fide settlers to purchase portions of the land, not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres in quantity, at $1.25 an acre within two years from the passage of the joint resolution; that is, up to and including April 10, 1871.

Mr. THURMAN. That applied to the then existing settlers?

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir. This bill authorizes any persons who are upon that land or who have gone upon it in pursuance of the joint resolution of April 10, 1869, to become the owners by paying the price fixed. In pursuance of that joint resolution there were thirty-three hundred and sixty-five entries of land made by actual bona fide settlers, and of that number twenty-two hundred and ninety-five paid to the Government a sum of money a little less than $300,000; but when the question of title arose between the railroad corporations under the decision of the Secretary of the Interior and the settlers or their grantor, the United States Government, these purchases were suspended, and during the period of litigation it continued until the decision of the Supreme Court in April, 1876, there has been nothing done by way of purchasing either from the Government or from the railroad corporations.

Mr. THURMAN. Now the point I want to know is if the present bill includes all who are now upon the lands.

Mr. INGALLS. The present bill provides in its first section:

That any bona fide settler, residing at the time of completing his or her entry, as hereinafter provided, upon any portion of the lands sold to the United States, by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867, who is a citizen of the United States, or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be, and hereby is, entitled to purchase the same, in quantity not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres, at the price of $1.40 per acre, within one year from the passage of this act, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and on the terms hereinafter provided.

Mr. THURMAN. That would include all persons who are now upon the land.

Mr. INGALLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Entirely beyond the act of 1869.

Mr. THURMAN. One question more. Are these lands subject to pre-emption?

Mr. INGALLS. They are not subject either to homestead or pre-emption entries. Under the provisions of the treaty they were to be sold upon the most advantageous terms for cash under such regulations as the Secretary of the Interior might prescribe, in accordance with the general land laws of the United States Government.

Mr. THURMAN. About how many settlers are there on the land?

Mr. INGALLS. As I have said to the Senate, under the terms of the joint resolution of 1869 there were 3,365 entries made, of whom 2,295, if I remember the number correctly, paid to the Government a sum a little less than $300,000; but that does not represent anything like the entire amount of inhabitants or population upon the land. It is fifteen hundred square miles in extent, considerably larger than the State of Rhode Island; has upon it a considerable number of thriving towns and villages, and contains, I presume, a population of not less than 30,000 people.

Now a word in regard to the suggestion made by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] At the time when this controversy arose as to the right of the railroad corporations or of the settlers in these lands, associations were formed for the purpose of trying that question. The settlers employed eminent counsel for that purpose. They believed, and the decision of two of the highest tribunals in the land has shown that their belief was right, that the title of the railroad corporations did not attach to these lands. In the court below they retained, as I said, very able and eminent counsel who were also authorized by the Attorney-General to appear before the Supreme Court upon the hearing of that case on appeal.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not at the expense of the United States.

Mr. INGALLS. No, sir, nor does this bill provide that it shall be at the expense of the United States. The Senator will observe that under the joint resolution of April 10, 1869, the price of these lands is fixed at $1.25 per acre. Senators may say that this was too much or not enough, but the fact remains that the Government of the United States by its legislative authority made a contract with these parties by which they agreed to sell them this land at $1.25 per acre, and it was in pursuance of that provision that these men entered upon the land, made their purchases, and perfected their improvements. It was thought best by the Attorney-General that, inasmuch as these questions were novel, inasmuch as the interests involved were very extensive, inasmuch as the questions were important and had not been previously adjudicated, those counsel who had tried the case in the court below and were therefore familiar with all the facts and with all the law, with the treaty and with the laws made in pursuance of it, should be retained and employed to represent the Government upon the final hearing of the cause before the Supreme Court; and the reason of that is very plain and the necessity for it, because had it been held that the title of the railroad corporations did attach, then the United States Government would have been held responsible for all the moneys that had been received by it under the provisions of the act of April 10, 1869. Therefore in a very important sense the Government was a party, and it became essential that those interests should be protected by counsel who were familiar with the law and with the facts by their argument in the court below. The settlers, after the case had been decided in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, agreed among themselves that the most equitable, the most uniform, and the simplest method of distributing all this burden upon the great body of these people who were most intimately affected by these questions and by their determination, and in order to relieve the Government of the United States itself of all responsibility of a pecuniary character for the fees of these gentlemen who had appeared in the circuit court and in the Supreme Court——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is there any such responsibility?

Mr. INGALLS. That I do not affirm.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is any such thing claimed by anybody?

Mr. INGALLS. That I do not claim. I am stating, in response to the Senator from Massachusetts, the reason why it was that these settlers themselves agreed upon this method of ascertaining and fixing and determining the amount that each one should pay in order to liquidate these fees that had been agreed upon between the counsel and the settlers and also to save the Government harmless and indemnified by reason of any additional expense incurred in that behalf. They therefore, knowing that under the joint resolution of April 10, 1869, their contract with the Government was that they should receive title at $1.25 per acre, agreed among themselves that they would voluntarily submit to the imposition of fifteen cents upon each and every acre of that tract which any man among them should purchase, and that out of the fund thus derived, being in excess of the amount which the joint resolution of April, 1869, fixed as the price of the land, the Attorney-General and the Secretary of the Interior should determine and ascertain the amount to be paid to the various parties who had been retained as counsel in the determination of these very important and interesting suits.

That is a history of this entire controversy, briefly, in as few words as I am able to give it.

Mr. WRIGHT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether he has any objection to the amendment I have offered as a substitute for the section?

Mr. INGALLS. Personally I have no objection whatever to any amendment that may be offered by any member of the Senate. Inasmuch, however, as it is my belief, expressed here publicly, and as the Senator from Iowa himself says that he understood that the only account to be liquidated out of this fund so derived from this fifteen cents per acre in excess of the $1.25 fixed by the joint resolution is the fees that were to be paid to the counsel, I can see no advantage to be gained by the substitute proposed by the Senator from Iowa. Personally I have no objection whatever to it; but there is this difficulty about it, that whatever amendments are attached to this bill in its present condition, and at the present stage of the session, are so many obstacles to final and favorable action by the House from which the bill itself emanated.

Mr. WRIGHT. If the construction of this section is correct as given by the Senator, what is the need of the language in the first part of the section and the subsequent language that it shall be held to include these fees? It seems to me the language of the first part of the section must contemplate something else than the fees of the attorneys, else there is no necessity for putting it there.

Mr. INGALLS. I am not responsible for the language, and the Senator will understand that I mean no offense when I make this response to him.

Mr. WRIGHT. Of course I understand that.

Mr. INGALLS. I did not draw the bill, and consequently I cannot say what would be the legal effect of the phraseology that has been employed. I can only say that my understanding derived from a familiar conversation with these people who represent in an official capacity the settlers upon these lands is that all they desire and all they propose is that the necessary attorney fees shall be paid out of this fund in order to save the Government harmless from any expense and to indemnify it against all costs.

Mr. WRIGHT. Let me ask my friend whether in his opinion, if the language be left as it is now, there is not danger that it will include something else than the fees of attorneys? Why not make it plain?

Mr. INGALLS. I do not know what else could be included except the fees of the attorneys. I am not aware that there are any other costs or expenses than those that have been incurred for that purpose. If there should be other than those, it is possible of course that they might under this language be held to be included.

Mr. LOGAN. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Kansas. In reading the bill the increase from $1.25 to $1.40 an acre is due to the fact that under the treaty promulgated in 1867, the time having lapsed and settlements not being made, the Government now has authority to change the price.

Mr. INGALLS. No; the Senator does not understand me. The settlers, as I said, who went on this land under the joint resolution of 1869 were very nearly four thousand; they are there to-day, and there is a settler or occupant, or claimant at least, to every quarter section of land within this whole territory. They are there under and by virtue of the contract that was made by the United States Government in the joint resolution of 1869.

Mr. LOGAN. That required them to apply within two years. Those who did apply within two years are not affected by this bill, I understand.

Mr. INGALLS. Within two years from that time, within less than two years from that time, the Secretary of the Interior made a ruling that the rights of the railroad corporations attached upon this land, by virtue of which they were entitled to every alternate section upon which there were settlers under the provisions of the joint resolution of 1869.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is within twenty miles of the line of the road.

Mr. INGALLS. That would cover the whole contract, because it is but thirty miles wide.

Mr. LOGAN. But the point I was getting at is that by the decision of the court in favor of the Government those men who have complied with the law are not affected by this bill. By the decision of the court they are entitled to have a patent from the Government. This bill then only affects those who made their locations after the two years, who did not apply within the two years.

Mr. INGALLS. Those who have paid their $1.25 per acre of course will have nothing more to pay unless the terms of this bill should be adopted, by which, in accordance with the wishes of the settlers, this fifteen cents an acre is to be added for the purpose of creating a fund out of which to defray the expenses of the Government in the way of the lawsuits.

Mr. LOGAN. I have no difficulty about the Government increasing the price or as to the disposition of the fund. That is not the point that bothers me at all. As to the right of Congress to do it, I have no doubt; but the point that bothers me is whether the bill itself applies to those who have complied with the law under the resolution of 1869.

Mr. INGALLS. Undoubtedly it does.

Mr. LOGAN. By the decision of the Supreme Court, they having applied, although their application may be suspended, they would not be included in this bill. That is the point I want to know. If they are included in the bill, then my judgment is that it ought to be amended in that particular. If not, I think there is no difficulty about it.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Kansas whether he has any information about what would be the amount of this fund arising from the fifteen cents an acre.

Mr. INGALLS. The tract being fifty miles in length by thirty in width would contain fifteen hundred sections of land, or in all 960,000 acres, and the Senator is capable of making the computation as to the amount that will be derived from fifteen cents an acre on that amount, or one-half of it.

Mr. DAWES. I did not know but that the Senator had done that.

Mr. INGALLS. I have not.

Mr. DAWES. One hundred and forty-four thousand dollars, the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] says to me. Does the Senator from Kansas think that would be enough to defray the counsel fees?

Mr. INGALLS. Not having been retained in the case and being entirely unfamiliar with the amount of professional labor which was transacted, I am unable to respond. My impression, however, would be that a liberal computation would probably come inside the amount named by the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. Has the Senator any knowledge of the contract that the settlers' association entered into with these counsel, what the terms of it were?

Mr. INGALLS. I have no knowledge whatever except in a general way, as it has been communicated to me by rumor.

Mr. DAWES. By what, then, is the Attorney-General to be governed in determining how much he shall take out of this fund for counsel?

Mr. INGALLS. By sound discretion.

Mr. DAWES. Sound discretion without regard to contract?

Mr. INGALLS. Taken in connection with the contract.

Mr. DAWES. If there is a contract and we propose to raise a fund to liquidate that contract, would it not be worth while for us to know what the terms of the contract are?

Mr. INGALLS. Inasmuch as the Senator from Massachusetts as one member of the House of Representatives at that time agreed to sell this land to these people for $1.25 an acre, it appears to me that if they themselves agree to an additional imposition of fifteen cents per acre for the purpose of holding the Government harmless against these expenses, whatever they may be, certainly he has no reason to complain.

Mr. DAWES. Inasmuch as having been one of the House of Representatives that promised to sell to these settlers this land for $1.25 an acre, I have some little scruple about making them pay $1.40 an acre after having promised them that they should have it for $1.25 unless I can understand clearly all about this fifteen cents additional that is put on; and some of the elements that enter into this inquiry and trouble me at every step are these that I have put to the Senator. First, I should like to know whether it is necessary that it should be fifteen cents on an acre. I understand from him that would bring over $144,000. Then I inquire of him if that is enough, and he puts me off by saying that I know as much about it as he does. Then I inquire with perfect sincerity and a desire to know whether I am violating that contract I made when I was in the House of Representatives, to which he has been so kind as to allude, by promising them that they should have the land for $1.25 an acre, whether this does not mean after all that a few men enter into a contract with counsel to pay them their expenses and their fees, and this is a plan to make others who did not enter into that contract and who bought their land for $1.25 an acre on my promise in the House of Representatives and put their money in the Treasury take out of their pockets fifteen cents an acre more to pay the counsel whom other people promised to pay. If all these settlers are content with this fifteen cents an acre to pay counsel, it is just as long as it is short to close this bill without the fifteen cents an acre on it and tell them to take their fifteen cents out of their pockets to pay the counsel, as it is to take it out of their pockets and give it to the United States and let the United States pay the counsel. If they all agree to it, it is not necessary. If they are not all agreed to it, it is a violation of the promise I made in the House of Representatives when I agreed that they should have the land at $1.25 an acre. That is the trouble with me.

I am very anxious that these counsel shall have their pay; I am very anxious that they shall be paid well; I am very anxious that the men who employed them should pay them; and I am very anxious, too, that the men who bought this land upon my promise in the House of Representatives that they should have it for $1.25 an acre should have that promise kept, and if they have made any engagement to pay counsel I cannot for the life of me see why they cannot pay them just as well as to have assessed upon them $144,000 to be paid into the Treasury of the United States and then the Attorney-General of the United States clothed with authority, governed by a sound discretion coupled with an agreement that nobody knows what it is, and with these elements a sound discretion and an unknown agreement, to take out of this $144,000 just about what will result from that process of his mind, to wit, a sound discretion and the element of a contract, we do not know what it is, and pay it over to the counsel. Everybody has agreed that that shall be done, we are told. Then why on earth cannot they pay their counsel as other people do, and take their land at a dollar and a quarter an acre?

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator will understand, of course, that I do not in any sense whatever represent these attorneys, and to me personally it is a matter of absolute indifference whether they get their fees or not; but I can only say from a somewhat intimate acquaintance with a very large number of the people who now inhabit this tract of country that I believe this arrangement meets with their entire sanction and that they are practically unanimous in their desire that the bill shall pass with this provision in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Even those that bought under the railroad and whose title was defeated by the decision?

Mr. INGALLS. I will say that this bill has been now pending since the middle of April; I introduced it the day after the opinion was announced in the Supreme Court affirming the title of the Government in these lands. A very large number of copies were immediately sent to that region of the country. It was published in every newspaper that is printed on the tract. I have received a very large and voluminous correspondence since on the subject of the bill, and I have yet to receive the first protest against these provisions. So far as that testimony is of any value, I give it to show what the sentiment of the people themselves is who are to be affected by this provision of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a House bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I introduced the same bill substantially in the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas a question in reference to section 3, which provides—

> That the parties desiring to make entries under the provisions of this act who will, within twelve months after the passage of the same, make payment, &c.

The other sections following have the one-dollar-and-forty-cent-per-acre provision. I ask whether that does not determine the class of persons who will have to pay by the construction of the word "entries?" What is the entry of land?

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose that would include all those who are now upon the land or shall be upon the land at the time when this bill shall become a law?

Mr. LOGAN. Who have not paid the Government?

Mr. EDMUNDS. It covers all those who have paid as well.

Mr. LOGAN. I think not. It applies only to those who enter after the passage of the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But there is no legal entry in the technical sense yet, because the Secretary of the Interior refused to allow the entry.

Mr. LOGAN. Before they made their entry at the land office of the State? That I understand is the entry of land by application at the local land office. If that is not true, if it is a fact that they were not permitted to make their entry on the books of the land office in the State, then it would apply to all. There is no doubt about that. That was the point I wanted to ask.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On the alternate sections I think the Senator will find—though I am not at all familiar with the details of the case, although I argued it in the Supreme Court on a question of law—that the land officers were instructed not to allow entries.

Mr. LOGAN. That is the point I was inquiring about. If they were not permitted to make their entry, of course this bill applies to them, and that was exactly the point I was trying to get at, whether the persons who had complied with the resolution of 1869 were permitted to make their entries or whether the suspension was prior to the entry.

Mr. INGALLS. There were twenty-two hundred and ninety-five actual cash entries made under the joint resolution of April 10, 1869, from which the Government received something in excess of $290,000.

Mr. HARVEY. My knowledge and belief concerning this bill coincide with my colleague. I understand this fifteen cents an acre to be agreed to by the settlers as the most equitable and satisfactory way of adjusting the expenses they incurred by the employment of counsel to defend their rights in this matter. I think there is substantial unanimity among them on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. SARGENT in the chair.] The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] to section 8.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "at the instance," after the word "retained," where the words are "at the instance of the settlers," and insert "by;" so as to read "retained by the settlers;" for I am informed on the very best authority that the United States never retained anybody at all. They authorized the private counsel of the settlers, as they do in all cases where there are private interests involved, when they desire, to appear and argue the cause. That implies that the United States retained somebody, and by inference therefore is responsible to pay somebody.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection to that amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment is accepted.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move to amend still further by striking out "Interior" in the two places where it reads "the Secretary of the Interior" and insert "Treasury;" so as to read "Secretary of the Treasury," and after the word "Treasury," where it occurs in the second place, to insert:

After said accounts shall have been audited and allowed by the accounting officers, shall pay to the parties entitled thereto the sum so allowed.

And strike out all after the word "allowed."

Mr. WRIGHT. As I understand the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts, it is to confer the duties provided for in this section, and imposed on the Secretary of the Interior, upon the Secretary of the Treasury, and to provide further that there shall be an auditing of the accounts before they shall be paid. That I understand to be the proposition of the Senator. I have no objection to this amendment. My object in the amendment I have offered is to confine the amount that is to be paid to the legitimate purpose that is specified in the amendment, and that is the fees of the attorneys who were employed, and not apply it to anything else. Whatever may be done to assist in the way of perfecting that I have no objection to. If that amendment to my substitute shall be adopted it will still be for the Senate to determine whether they will have it in at all. My object is to have the section as perfect as possible before voting on the question of striking out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. WRIGHT. I accept the amendment.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, I should like to have some information to guide my vote on this part of the bill. My understanding is, and the Senator from Kansas who knows the facts can correct me, that originally on this tract of land, there being a dispute about the title and there being a division among the dwellers as to which side they took in that dispute, although I presume a great majority was on one side, a certain portion of these settlers procured a bill to be filed to remove a cloud on the title——

Mr. INGALLS. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him there, as he desires to be correct about the facts?

Mr. CONKLING. I do.

Mr. INGALLS. There was a joint resolution introduced for that purpose; but subsequently, upon the application of myself and my colleague to the Attorney-General, he directed the suit to be brought of his own motion for the purpose of testing the question of title involved in the construction of the acts of 1863 and 1869.

Mr. CONKLING. What portion of my statement does the Senator think he has corrected?

Mr. INGALLS. I understood the Senator to say there was a bill passed for the purpose of removing a cloud on the title.

Mr. CONKLING. Had the Senator attended a little more narrowly, he would have heard me say that a bill was filed, not passed, but filed.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon; I thought the Senator referred to legislative proceedings.

Mr. CONKLING. No, sir. I am out of legislation for the moment. There was a bill filed to remove a cloud on the title. That was the bill; I read it. The alleged cloud was a patent and proceedings under a patent which they sought to have set aside and thus remove the cloud on their title. That suit commenced and that bill was filed by the district attorney whose name, I think, was Shannon.

Mr. INGALLS. No.

Mr. CONKLING. He was the attorney of record. Does the Senator say no?

Mr. INGALLS. The attorney of the United States for that district was Mr. George R. Peck. Governor Shannon, of historic fame in the State of Kansas, was one of the counsel retained by the settlers who appeared in the court below.

Mr. CONKLING. Very well; then it may be that Mr. Peck was the attorney of record and Mr. Shannon's name appeared of counsel. Those two gentlemen filed a bill. The attorney of record, or more exactly speaking, the solicitor, was the district attorney of that district. I cannot be mistaken about that because, as I say, I once had occasion to look at the bill a long time ago. In filing that bill he represented an association of men which taken altogether was made up of a part of the settlers on this tract. They were in hostility to the railroad title. There were other settlers, and my recollection is a great many of them, who had taken their titles under the railroad and they insisted on that title. Fortunately for them they were not required to employ counsel to defend their title, because the railroad company, being the grantor, and having given covenants of warranty, was called upon, although it was defunct, through its receiver, to employ counsel and maintain title for itself and for the settlers to whom it had granted. Thus, as I understand it—and at all times, if I am wrong, I of course want to be set right—a litigation was waged for a part of these settlers against the grantor of other settlers. I see the Senator shakes his head. I wish he would shake it audibly.

Mr. INGALLS. In the name of the United States Government against the railroad companies.

Mr. CONKLING. My friend is very particular about terms. I am aware that this was a proceeding in the name of the United States, which might be implied from the statement I made, that the alleged cloud on the title was a patent, and proceedings under the patent; and, therefore, the form which the action took was an assertion that not to the railroad companies but to the United States still belonged the title to these lands. Is not that right?

Mr. INGALLS. That is correct.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I was correct before except that I did not stop for the moment to state the circumlocution which entered into the technicality of the proceedings. To resume my way of stating it, which aims at substance and not at form, here was, I repeat, a litigation in which a large number of the settlers contended with other settlers upon that tract about the title. The larger number insisted that they held from the United States, that the United States was their guarantor and that title was good. The others held that the title had passed to the railroad company, and the railroad company was their grantor, and thus they held title. That was the issue. The Supreme Court decided, as Mr. Justice Miller had in the first instance decided, in short, that that patent was void and that the title was good which was asserted in the name of the United States; and that was the holding of those who sympathized with the plaintiff in that suit; and those who sympathized with the railroad company and held under it were beaten.

I understand the bill proposes that by operation of law an assessment of fifteen cents an acre shall be made upon the possessions of these settlers, share and share alike, to pay, to make up a sum-total of $144,000, which is to be devoted to paying the counsel who carried on this litigation, and devoted to no other purpose that I have heard explained. Two things strike me. First, can it be possible that a bill filed by the district attorney or in his name to remove a cloud on title and adjudged at the first instance, and an appeal taken to the Supreme Court and the decree confirmed by the Supreme Court, has involved, unless there was an immense army of counsel, to any number of counsel that we can suppose were in good faith retained, a labor which it requires $144,000 to compensate?

Mr. OGLESBY. Was it not a question of law?

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend asks me was it not a question of law. He might have put a narrower question and I could have answered it in form. It involved a question of the construction of a statute which I do not think is longer in print, being a single section, than that envelope [holding up an envelope] is broad. The question was whether, under a particular section of a statute, the patents and the proceedings under those patents were authentic or not; in other words, whether under that statute this title did remain in the United States and did inure to the benefit of those who claimed under it, or whether the proceedings by which the railway company said it took were unauthentic under that section and the conveyances which they had made to the settlers were valid. That was the question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. And that is the whole question that I ever heard of in the case. Perhaps I ought to say, to be entirely frank about it, as the honorable Senator from Kansas remarked that he had never been retained in the case, that I was once retained in the case by a receiver, if I remember aright, of one of these railway companies, the purpose of my retainer being to argue in the Supreme Court a motion which I think resulted substantially in a motion to postpone one of these cases or all of them to the end that parties who had not had an opportunity to answer might come in and appear on the record, and all be heard who wished to be heard. It was through that motion that I came to know something of the facts which are now stated from a somewhat faded memory. I say, first, I can hardly understand how the litigation carried on to obtain a legal construction of one brief section of a statute, a cause in which the judgment was not reversed and sent back to a new trial but which was tried once and the decree affirmed by the Supreme Court, did involve such labor for one counsel or for two counsel; I believe there were but two.

Mr. INGALLS. Three.

Mr. CONKLING. Three includes the district attorney?

Mr. INGALLS. Three besides the district attorney.

Mr. CONKLING. I can hardly understand how three counsel earned at two hearings upon that section of the statute, one at nisi prius and one before the court in banc, $144,000.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator does not certainly suppose that this bill proposes to pay them $144,000.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the object of levying this contribution of fifteen cents an acre?

Mr. INGALLS. The bill expressly says in the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth lines of the eighth section that the amount of costs and expenses shall be ascertained and certified by the Attorney-General to the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. CONKLING. What is to be done with the balance?

Mr. INGALLS. I suppose if it is collected it is to be devoted to the civilization fund. I conceive of nothing else to be done with it.

Mr. CONKLING. I am in favor of all funds, general and special, for civilization.

Mr. INGALLS. I should have stated the fund for the civilization of Indians.

Mr. CONKLING. My regret is that I cannot augment the object of such funds. Anything which tends to civilize anybody, red or white, I am in favor of, as a general proposition; but I do humbly submit that when the Senate is asked to impose upon all these lands fifteen cents an acre as a tribute or contribution to be taken out of them to pay counsel fees, we ought to know a little more about it. If the total is $144,000 and it turns out that only $10,000, or $20,000, is necessary, and the residue of it will go to the civilization fund, then we ought to have a section for that purpose and it ought not to go in the name of counsel fees. I consider that a bad baptism for legislation to civilize those from whom the money is to be taken. I say I do not understand why it is necessary, as a jump in the dark or a guess or an estimate, to give $144,000 for this purpose.

But there is another thing. I heard the honorable Senator from Kansas speak of rumors and fleeting conversations, if I got the word, but what those rumors or fleeting conversations are I do not know; but speaking from conjecture upon the face of the bill, I should say that if fifteen cents an acre be the sum, making a total which we know beforehand is $144,000, it would seem to imply that some measure of compensation had been agreed upon either positively or contingently which leads to so large a total. I do not mean to intimate that any counsel in this case indulged in what I suppose I may call a very questionable professional proceeding of making an agreement upon the practice of some veterinary surgeons or horse-doctors of whom I have heard, "No cure no pay;" that is making an agreement based upon the idea that a lawyer does an insurance business and not a law business, an agreement by which if he does his duty all the way and fails he is to receive nothing, and if he succeeds he is to receive a compensation which would be regarded as extraordinary, if it were merely to be governed by the rule of quantum meruit——

Mr. HOWE. Whether he does his duty or not.

Mr. CONKLING. And that, as my honorable friend very properly reminds me, whether he does his duty or not, whether the success comes from some mere veering of the winds of chance or from some faithful, laborious, and recondite service which he performs. I do not mean to intimate anything of that sort, and yet I must say that unless there has been some understanding or some suggestion by which in the event which has happened, namely, the confirmation of this decree, somebody is to receive at a rate which will mount up to $144,000, being fifteen cents an acre on this land, I cannot conjecture within the limited range of my understanding why a body composed largely of lawyers should on any state of the case before them find as a matter of fact, because I know legislation is mixed of law and of fact, and to vote for this provision we must find as a matter of fact, as far as we know, that $144,000 is a suitable compensation for three gentlemen who discussed at nisi prius and afterward before the court in banc the meaning of one single section of a statute not two inches long as it stands in print.

Mr. THURMAN. Will the Senator tell me, for I am very ignorant of this matter, what are the facts in the case?

Mr. CONKLING. As well as I can tell the Senator I will. The Senator from Kansas has corrected me until I believe I can. It was a bill filed in the name of the United States by the district attorney of the district in which the bill was filed. The object of the bill was, as I said, to remove a cloud on the title. Stating it with less artificiality, its purpose was to affirm that under this section of the statute certain patents which had gone to a railway company and hence, by conveyances made by them under those patents to settlers, were void, and that in truth under the law the land remained in the United States, and that other persons were entitled to come in under the laws of the United States, and paying the price fixed by those laws to take the lands themselves.

Mr. THURMAN. One question more. Who employed the outside counsel?

Mr. CONKLING. As I understand it, the outside counsel sprang up in this way: Here on this tract were a great many people. Some of them had bought under the railway title and they strenuously insisted on that. Some of them had taken lands under the idea that they could proceed under the laws of the United States directly with the United States and by paying the price there nominated become possessed of the title. The persons who represented the latter idea, or a part of them, formed an association, as I hear it called here, which association through its organs retained one, two, three counsel seriatim; and these three counsel proceeding in the name of the district attorney filed a bill in the name of the United States to assert the existence of the title of the United States and the invalidity of this contending title. Mr. Justice Miller, sitting at nisi prius, held that that section of the statute continued the title in the United States and that the railway title was void. From that an appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court, after hearing the argument, confirmed the decree, and that ended it.

Mr. THURMAN. Were these outside counsel, as I call them, not out of disrespect certainly, employed by the Government?

Mr. CONKLING. Never in any sense that I hear of. The Senator from Ohio evidently anticipates what I was coming to say, the other thing which I do not understand, and that is what the United States or Congress has to do with the matter. The district attorney appeared in a purely perfunctory way to allow his name to go on the record as solicitor, and therefore nobody owes him anything. If the counsel were employed by this association of settlers and have or have not made a special agreement, why on earth does not this association of settlers pay its counsel and settle with them just as any other men would do, whether they were acting in the association or acting by individual right?

The honorable Senator says he introduced the bill in April. It was published far and wide. The newspapers mentioned it; copies were sent; everybody knows it; nobody has protested. I infer from that and from other statements the Senator has made that this legislation proceeds upon the theory that these men are in all accord. Then, why do we want the instrumentality of an act of Congress to levy upon every acre of this ground fifteen cents, amass it in a fund, hand it over to the Attorney-General, and then to commit to his discretion the disposition of the fund? What is that disposition? It is either to execute an agreement, if there be a valid agreement, measuring this compensation, or else it is to have these gentlemen present their bills and scrutinize them as any other client would and if they differ refer it to somebody, and then pay whatever appears due. Does a man need an act of Congress to pay his doctor's bill or his lawyer's bill?

Mr. SARGENT. What is to be done with the surplus?

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator from Kansas says, by way of conjecture, if I understand him—he disclaimed any knowledge about it—if anything is left over it is to go to the general fund for civilization.

Mr. INGALLS. Under the treaty of 1867.

Mr. CONKLING. It is to go into the general civilization fund, upon which I observed, if we are to levy a contribution of fifteen cents an acre to deposit some definite sum in the general civilization fund we had better say so; we had better do it and not appropriate the money under the name of counsel fees, contingent or otherwise, in order to have a sum we know not how much go in some contingency which may never arise into a civilization fund.

Mr. President, it would as ill become me in principle as in interest to stand in the way of a lawyer being paid for what he does. I should consider it very hard that I should not be paid; and I should consider it especially hard if the man who employed me and who reaped the fruits of my labor would not pay me. Therefore I am in favor of these gentlemen being paid whatever is due to them. No doubt they rendered services which should be paid for at a suitable rate; but if this act is to operate upon those who are in law and in equity chargeable with these expenses, to wit, the people who employed these counsel, or, speaking in the language of the bill, at whose instance and request the counsel performed this service, what is the sense of taking it out of their lands and putting it in the pocket of the United States and then having the United States turn around and hand it to the counsel, when the easy way is for them to arrange this private transaction between themselves and their counsel? If, on the other hand, we want something as large as an act of Congress to descend upon the lands of these men who never did agree to go into this litigation, who omitted or refused to become contributors to this litigation, nay, if the object is to have this levy made upon the lands of those who asserted the railway title, who stood in hostility to this proceeding, who were defeated in the suit, then I can see a great deal for the act to take hold of; but that great deal is just so much of objection as I understand it, to our undertaking here by force and might, by an act of legislation to levy forced contributions against those who never employed counsel but whose interests were wrapped up in the other side and who were cast and defeated in the litigation. I do not understand this at all. It may be much clearer to others than it is to me; but I say that if the design is to enforce payment from those who created the debt they do not need us to enforce it. If they sue and recover their debtors and clients cannot even "beat them on the execution." An execution if there is not personalty to answer it will descend upon and take these lands and devote them to the satisfaction of this debt. That is all provided for in existing law. If that is to be the whole purpose and effect of the bill I should say it was not only a work of supererogation but something more than that. On the other hand if the purpose is to subject the property, be it real or personal, of those who never employed counsel and who never agreed to pay them, who were adverse to the proceeding, who were defeated and whose patents went down with the proceeding, to a forced contribution to pay the counsel fees of the victors over them, any principle of equity which covers that must be more elastic than any principle of which I know. If this is not true, if I am mistaken in the position of this matter and the facts I would be very glad to hear it from any Senator who will enlighten me for I will vote for anything which is right in my view to enable these gentlemen to get their pay, but it seems to me there is nothing to be done except to let their other clients settle.

Mr. MORRILL. May I ask the Senator from New York whether he thinks the United States would or would not be accountable to the Indian civilization fund for these fifteen cents additional received from this land?

Mr. CONKLING. I am not sure I apprehend the Senator. Does he mean that if we levy the fifteen cents an acre and it turns out on adjustment that half of it is due to counsel fees and the other half remains, whether we would then be liable to pay that over?

Mr. MORRILL. Whether we should not be liable for the whole sum. Have the Indians any lot or parcel in this suit?

Mr. CONKLING. That never occurred to me until this moment; but I must say I think it is a very pertinent question. I do not know. The Senator who puts the question sees probably more clearly than I do that it involves a reference to statutes and treaties.

Mr. MORRILL. I will say, as I understand it, under the treaty we are to pay $300,000 and the remainder of the proceeds are to go to the civilization fund. I do not see why we would not be liable for the whole amount.

Mr. CONKLING. By our act we take fifteen cents out of this land. We take it at our peril, and the Indians not being privy to that, the question is whether they have not a claim against us, as far as Indians have a claim against anybody and especially against the United States, to make that good. That is a very awkward question. It is a conundrum which I would rather my friend from Kansas would answer than myself to undertake to answer it.

Mr. INGALLS. This debate seems to have degenerated into a controversy whether certain attorneys should be paid their fees, and, if so, how much and in what manner. I cannot consent, so far as I am concerned myself, to be placed in the attitude to advocate the payment of fees, whether extortionate, reasonable, or otherwise, to these or to any other attorneys. I may say in passing that I am not and never have been an attorney upon either side of this case. I had the opportunity of appearing and was offered a retainer for the side that was successful in the circuit court and in the Supreme Court; but I thought as a question of delicacy, to say nothing more, that it was hardly consistent with my duties as a Senator to take a fee and appear in court upon a matter upon which I might subsequently be called upon to vote. Therefore I say that I have no inclination, no interest, no motive whatever to say whether these attorneys shall be paid or whether they shall not; neither am I here to advocate their claims or to protest against them. It is to me absolutely immaterial whether they are paid or not. I simply stand here representing a certain community, a portion of my own constituency in the State of Kansas, who have, so far as I know, unanimously expressed their desire that the expense that has been incurred shall be paid in the manner proposed in the bill. If the Senate think that that is inappropriate, that it is not a desirable method of legislation, I shall be entirely satisfied to have that expression recorded. All that I desire is that these thirty thousand people, who in consequence of this determination of the Supreme Court are without a title to their homes which they themselves have purchased at the invitation of the Government, shall have some means afforded by which they can secure a title and by which the consequent disorder and agitation and danger may be averted. It is for that purpose that I have urged this bill upon the attention of the Senate, and if a majority of the body desire to express their opinion that this method of adjudicating the claims between the settlers and their attorneys is not to be approved, all I have to say is that I shall be content. I ask that action may be taken upon the bill so far as the question of the title itself is concerned, and that we may pass from these incidental topics to those certainly which are material.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to add to the amendment proposed by my colleague the following:

> And all the remainder of the proceeds of such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of the civilization fund provided for by treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribes of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867.

Mr. INGALLS. Is that in order now?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The other amendment having been accepted, it has become a part of the original amendment. The question is upon the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one objection to the amendment to the amendment which, unless removed by technical words, will leave this as one of those unhappy funds in the Treasury which are always the prey of the spoiler; that is a trust fund. Senators have had their attention called lately to the nature of having trust funds in the Treasury. The cotton fund was a most notable case, and the fund arising from the proceeds of captured and abandoned property. I never will knowingly vote for a proposition that will retain in the Treasury these separate trusts in the nature of trust funds. I could name twenty of them that ought now to be covered in the Treasury; for instance, the naval pension fund, the Japanese fund, the Chinese fund, the Choctaw fund, and ever so many more. They ought to be covered to the Treasury subject to appropriations made by Congress, because if allowed to remain as trust funds they are subject to the disposition of officers other than those charged by the Constitution with the custody of public money.

There is another objection to the measure, it seems to me. I am perfectly willing to pay these gentlemen their fees. When this bill was up the other day I expressed that desire. I am willing to pay them liberal fees, because by the decision of the court, founded purely upon their labors, the Government of the United States and the settlers have secured the possession of title to lands; but when it is proposed to set aside a fund of $144,000 to pay two or three lawyers I must most respectfully dissent. Therefore I think the provisions of the bill ought to be more guarded. It ought to be so restricted as that somebody will be charged with the power to fix what ought equitably to be paid to these attorneys.

Another section in the bill while I am up I may as well mention. The policy of selling lands upon credit, and especially upon four years' credit, is a very bad one indeed. These lands ought to be sold for cash. The third section of the bill authorizes the Commissioner to sell these lands on four years' time. First it gives a year in which the settler may make his entry. Then it allows him to pay one-fourth down and the balance in three annual payments, with 5 per cent. interest. The result is, as 5 per cent. is much less than the rate of interest in Kansas, every settler will claim the benefit accorded by this rate of interest. When these men take the land they ought to pay for it in cash. Let them borrow the money if they choose, but they should get it. The Government of the United States has never been fortunate when it undertook, as this bill authorizes, to take a mortgage or to make a contract and enter upon that contract payments. The result is that debtors are very slow in paying the Government money. The time will not be long, not more than a year or two, when a bill will be introduced in Congress to relieve these people not only from the interest but probably from the principal. It seems to me, therefore, if these lands are to be sold to the settlers, and I think they ought to be, they ought to pay whatever price is fixed upon in money within one year and then take out their title.

Mr. ALLISON. In answer to the suggestions made by the Senator from Ohio I will state the reason for offering my amendment. The treaty with the Great and Little Osages covering this particular tract of land was made in 1865, and the Government of the United States advanced to these tribes $300,000. Then these lands were to be sold by the Government of the United States for the best attainable price and the cost of sale; the $300,000 was to be re-imbursed to the Treasury and the remainder of the fund, whatever it might be, was to be set aside under the control of the Secretary of the Interior as a civilization fund, not for the Great and Little Osages but for all the Indian tribes in the United States.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him there just for a moment? Suppose we place a fund to the credit of the civilization of the Indians, who is to determine whether Sitting Bull is to be killed as the only way you can civilize him? It is a charity which if put in a will or charitable bequest would be void for uncertainty.

Mr. ALLISON. That is the precise point I wish now to meet. The Secretary of the Interior has so construed the first article of the treaty that under it he has hitherto without limitation disposed of this civilization fund. We have sold 358,000 acres of these lands, and the Secretary of the Interior, without any control whatever, has disposed of this fund thus far.

Mr. HOWE. For how much were these lands sold?

Mr. ALLISON. They were sold at a dollar and a quarter an acre under the resolution of 1869, which I suppose has been quoted in this debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to the legal rights of everybody, including the Indians?

Mr. ALLISON. Undoubtedly. They were sold at this price, and this fund has been used by the Secretary of the Interior in support of the common schools in these various tribes, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. Some of it may have gone to the Sioux, some of it to tribes in Wisconsin or to tribes in Oregon. It has been disposed of solely in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. RANDOLPH. Has the money been re-imbursed to the Treasury?

Mr. ALLISON. The $300,000 has been re-imbursed and the cost of sale. There has been a fund in addition of about $200,000 that has been thus disposed of. The very object of my amendment is to place this fund within the control of Congress. It proposes that this fund shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of this fund, because the treaty says it shall be to the credit of this fund. I wish to ask the Senator from Ohio how this fund will ever be got out of the Treasury without an act of Congress?

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, what I object to is that he has not used the necessary technical words.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will thank the Senator to insert them.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will read the Senator's amendment and show wherein it is defective.

Mr. ALLISON. I only wrote it at my desk hurriedly, and would be glad to have the Senator correct it.

Mr. SHERMAN. The amendment reads:

> And all the remainder of the proceeds of such sale shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

The word "covered" ought to be used. That is the technical word which includes a payment by a proper draft.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well; I will make that change.

Mr. SHERMAN. I suggest to the Senator to insert "and subject to the action of Congress."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That destroys it; that destroys what the Senator is saying.

Mr. ALLISON. The first section of the treaty states how it shall be disposed of. It shall be disposed of—

Under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education and civilization of Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States.

I have no doubt that Congress can say how this fund shall be disposed of. By a decision of the Supreme Court of the United States we are suddenly placed in the possession of a fund which will reach nearly one million dollars, because when the remainder of these lands are sold at a dollar and forty cents per acre this fund certainly will reach at least $800,000.

Mr. INGALLS. The civilization fund?

Mr. ALLISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGALLS. The Senator is strangely at fault in his arithmetic.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I shall be glad to be corrected by the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. INGALLS. Three hundred thousand dollars are to be subtracted from the gross amount, and there are but 960,000 acres in all.

Mr. ALLISON. My friend is strangely at fault with his facts. These $300,000 have already been re-imbursed to the Treasury; and not only that, all the costs of the survey and sale of these lands have been placed in the Treasury of the United States; so that every dollar of the remainder of this fund is a sacred trust belonging to the Indian tribes of the United States, and not to the Little and Great Osages. It is a fund that shall be used by the Government for the purpose of the education and civilization of all the Indian tribes in the United States. Therefore this fund, as I understand, will swell to the amount of six or seven or perhaps eight hundred thousand dollars, as there are nearly six hundred thousand acres of these lands yet undisposed of, which, if sold at $1.40 an acre, will realize from six to eight hundred thousand dollars. This is a fund that must be used for a particular purpose under this treaty.

Mr. THURMAN. If the Senator will allow me, do I understand that all the proceeds of any sale that is to be made of these lands will be trust funds?

Mr. ALLISON. They will be trust funds, and trust funds for a particular and specified purpose, namely, the education and civilization of Indian tribes.

Mr. THURMAN. Then the United States does not hold the title for its own use and benefit, but simply as trustees for the benefit of the Indians?

Mr. ALLISON. It holds the title in trust, as I understand, for the benefit of these Indians; and not only for their benefit, but to be applied in a specified and particular way, as provided for in the first article of the treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have drawn a modification of the amendment to the amendment, which the Senator from Iowa will see seeks to accomplish the same object:

And all the remainder of the proceeds of such lands—

That is, $300,000—

shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States, and expended by Congress for the civilization of Indians, as is provided for by treaty concluded, &c.

Mr. ALLISON. That is perfectly right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us see about it.

Mr. ALLISON. I agree to that if it is not in violation of the first article of the treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the idea.

Mr. RANDOLPH. What becomes of the authority of the Secretary of the Interior?

Mr. ALLISON. It is under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior. It does seem to me that Congress may by law provide for the method of the distribution of this fund.

Mr. SHERMAN. That is precisely what I seek to do by law. I do not want the Secretary of State to have power to disburse the Japanese fund. I do not want to give the Secretary of the Interior power to disburse this fund for the civilization of Indians. He might choose to civilize Sitting Bull. There are gross abuses that may arise. I do not speak of persons, but gross abuses have arisen and will arise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose the Senator means to stand by the solemn agreement of the treaty, whatever that fairly means?

Mr. SHERMAN. But I say this trust being in the Government of the United States may be invested in Congress as well as in the Secretary of the Interior. I do not know the phraseology of the treaty at all.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do you think the treaty will bear that construction?

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know. I have not heard the treaty read.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be a good thing to find out before you make the proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will hear the treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will just read it:

Said lands shall be surveyed and sold—

Of course I pass over the granting part in order to get down to the point—

under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, on the most advantageous terms, for cash, as public lands are surveyed and sold under existing laws; but no pre-emption claim or homestead settlement shall be recognized; and after re-imbursing the United States the cost of said survey and sale, and the said sum of $300,000 placed to the credit of said Indians—

That is provided for in advance; in advance the United States mean—

the remaining proceeds—

Which are these we now have to do with—the remaining proceeds of sales shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the "civilization fund"—

Quoting the words "civilization fund" as a fixed thing—to be used, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the education and civilization of Indian tribes residing within the limits of the United States.

That is the language of the treaty.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think that under that treaty we, the law-making power, may direct the Secretary of the Interior in the disposition of that trust fund. He is our officer and it seems to me that we should limit, restrain, and regulate his power over it. Let me put a case. The Secretary of the Interior can expend that fund in anything that may be covered by the term "civilization of the Indians." What does that mean? It is a term so broad that if a clause of that kind was in a will or any kind of a conveyance it would be void for uncertainty. It is not these particular Indians; not any particular Indians, but "Indians." We have East Indians, we have West Indians, we have our Indians, we have Choctaws and Cherokees, and all sorts of Indians. What is meant by the word "civilization?" Education is civilization. Marriage is an element of civilization. Sometimes killing is an element of civilization. Voting the republican ticket is the highest element of civilization, we think. How vague and indefinite this is? I say we ought not to place under the control of officers of the Government a fund upon terms so indefinite that the powers may be abused. It is impossible for us, although the money is placed in the Treasury, to know what demands may be made upon that money in the Treasury. The amount of these funds now in the Treasury nominally, although outside of the Treasury, as trust funds and upon which drafts may be made by various officers of the Government, is a considerable sum. Very large sums are already credited to various Indian tribes. It seems to me all these sums ought to be subject to disbursements by an appropriation made by Congress. The Constitution of the United States declares that "no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law." It is held that a law or treaty of that kind is an appropriation by Congress sufficient for them to hold it separate and apart as a trust fund, to be disbursed upon the order of the Secretary of the Interior. Is that wise? What is the object of the Constitution which guards all the money in the Treasury so that it can only be drawn in pursuance of an appropriation made by Congress? It must be made openly, both Houses assenting, the President assenting, made in clear and specific terms. It seems to me that it is clearly within our power, even under that treaty, to so regulate and guard this discretion of the Secretary of the Interior as to define the purposes for which this money shall be used, the degree of civilization and what means of civilization shall be provided for by the disbursement of this fund.

Therefore I favor the proposition submitted by the Senator from Iowa as now modified, which carries this money into the Treasury, covers it into the Treasury, so that it is subject to an appropriation by Congress alone, to be disbursed, if you please, by the Secretary of the Interior under the order of Congress, just as all other money in his Department is disbursed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then you substitute the discretion of Congress for the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior? That is the short of it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think there is any doubt of our power to do it. We make these appropriations, and the money is all disbursed under the care of the Secretary of the Interior at the end. We annually make the appropriations. We would say we appropriate $30,000 or $50,000 this year for the civilization of the Indians and specify how it shall be done. The Secretary of the Interior disburses that money upon our appropriation. It is all subject to his order and command. I see no difficulty in the way. I think Congress has full power to do it. In our annual appropriations in the disbursement of this money we necessarily place it under the control and power of the Secretary of the Interior to some extent, its actual investment, its payment, when it is to be paid, how fast it is to be paid, for what particular purpose it is to be paid, and it certainly might be left to Congress in perfect accordance with this treaty.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] as modified by the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it reported as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And all the remainder of the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States and expended by Congress for the civilization of the Indians as provided for by treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I shall feel obliged to vote against this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Vermont?

Mr. EDMUNDS, I beg pardon; I was not aware the Senator from Ohio had arisen.

Mr. HOWE. I should like to have the amendment reported to which this is an amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

That it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General of the United States, for the time being, to ascertain and determine the amount of the reasonable fees justly due to the attorneys retained by the settlers on said lands, with the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States, in the prosecution of the suits against the railroad companies herein named, in the circuit court of the United States for the district of Kansas, and the Supreme Court of the United States, for the purpose of testing the validity of the title to said lands claimed by the railroad companies; and that after determining the amount of said fees the Attorney-General shall certify the same, and to whom due, to the Secretary of the Treasury, and the said Secretary of the Treasury, after the said account shall be audited and allowed by the accounting officer of the Treasury, shall pay to the parties entitled thereto the sums here allowed.

Mr. THURMAN. Then comes the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa, as modified by my colleague.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then follows the addition.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am so much in favor of actual settlers on the public lands acquiring title to the lands upon which they settle, that I am strongly disposed to vote for so much of this bill as gives these settlers a right to perfect a title, or rather to procure a title to these lands. It is very true as I suppose from what I have heard, professing my ignorance on the subject, that they went upon these lands without any authority of law whatever; I do not know but in violation of law. It is very true that in all probability these lands are worth a great deal more than $1.40 an acre. It is very true that this bill does not provide that these lands shall be offered at public auction as other public lands are offered, but gives to these persons who have entered upon these lands without any authority of law a pre-emption right, not the pre-emption right provided for by the general statute but a special pre-emption right. Yet, in view of all the circumstances of the case, I confess that I have an inclination to let the settlers procure a title to these lands. After we have passed the homestead law, which I entirely approve; after we have passed a general pre-emption law, I do not know that it will do to stick in the bark and object to special pre-emption law, as this is, under the circumstances of the case; but after hearing the treaty read by the Senator from Vermont it does seem that this bill is in direct violation of that treaty. In the first place, the treaty provides that the lands shall be sold for cash as other public lands are sold. This bill provides that the lands shall be sold on credit, one fourth in hand and the rest in three equal annual installments. I ask the attention of the Senator from Vermont to what I am saying.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am always paying attention to the Senator.

Mr. THURMAN. The treaty, I understand, requires that the land shall be sold for cash as other public lands are sold.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And for the best price that can be got, "on the most advantageous terms."

Mr. THURMAN. On the best terms, which would seem to imply that they shall be offered as other public lands are, at public sale in the first instance.

Mr. INGALLS. Did the Senator hear the act of April 10, 1869, read, which applies to these very lands?

Mr. THURMAN. I will hear it now.

Mr. INGALLS. The act provides—

That any bona fide settler residing upon any portion of the lands sold to the United States by virtue of the first and second articles of the treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867, who is a citizen of the United States or shall have declared his intention to become a citizen of the United States, shall be, and hereby is, entitled to purchase the same in quantity not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres, at the price of $1.25 per acre, within two years from the passage of this act, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now read the last proviso, please.

Mr. THURMAN. That would only seem to prove that the act of 1869 was in violation of the treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Read the last proviso, and see.

Mr. INGALLS. The last proviso is in these words:

Provided, however, That nothing in this act shall be construed in any manner affecting any legal rights heretofore vested in any other party or parties.

And that was intended, I may say in passing, to preserve, as far as they could be preserved, the assumed or supposititious rights of railroad corporations.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should think from the language it was intended to preserve everybody's rights.

Mr. THURMAN. I should suppose that the proviso was intended to kill the section to which it was attached, and therefore I am inclined to think that the act of 1869, if I understood the treaty aright, was a plain violation of the treaty.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But for the proviso it would be.

Mr. INGALLS. The settlers are not to blame for that violation.

Mr. THURMAN. Undoubtedly not. My sympathies are with the settlers, though I think they were a little hasty in getting on the land; but that is the nature of our people, and I do not blame them for it. But one thing I regret, that the committee who reported this bill did not see fit to make a written report, setting forth the whole law and facts of the case. I confess that for one I want more information than I have on this subject; and if there is not a very strong desire to pass the bill to-night, I will move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. CRAGIN. I desire to enter a motion to reconsider.

Mr. THURMAN. At the request of the Senator from Iowa I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877.

The message also announced that the President of the United States having returned to the House of Representatives, in which it originated, the bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany, with his objections thereto, the House of Representatives had proceeded in pursuance of the Constitution to reconsider the same, and had passed it by a two-thirds vote notwithstanding the objections.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ALLISON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 11, 18, and 22.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 21, 23, and 24.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out on page 1 of the bill lines 15 and 16; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out of said amendment the word "fourteen," and insert in lieu thereof the word "eleven," and strike out "eight hundred and eighty," and at the end of the amendment add as follows: "Which shall be in full for the pay of the said band and for all company musicians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, any law to the contrary notwithstanding;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 12 and 13, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out from each of said amendments the word "five" and insert in each in lieu thereof the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 20, with an amendment striking out on page 5 lines 11 and 12 of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

W. B. ALLISON,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
WM. A. WALLACE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAML. J. RANDALL,
ERASTUS WELLS,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that that bill be printed in such form that we can understand it as it will be amended by this report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

ALBERT GRANT.

Mr. CRAGIN. The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3182) for the relief of Albert Grant, reported the same adversely, and it has been indefinitely postponed. I have been requested to make a motion to reconsider that vote indefinitely postponing the bill, and that the same may be placed upon the Calendar. I know nothing about the case, but a gentleman for whom I have great respect asks me to make this motion. The chairman of the committee makes no objection to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to reconsidering the vote? The Senator from New Hampshire moves to reconsider the vote by which the bill was indefinitely postponed, and that the bill be placed on the Calendar. Is their objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

OSAGE LANDS IN KANSAS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3625) providing for the sale of the Osage ceded lands in Kansas to actual settlers.

Mr. INGALLS. Inasmuch as the court has adjourned to assemble at twelve o'clock on Monday, I ask unanimous consent that without further action or motion on my part this bill that we have now been considering may be considered as the unfinished business on the first legislative day.

Mr. ALLISON. I have no objection to that, subject to the river and harbor bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have no objection to it, subject to the bill about the Pacific railroads and one or two others that are of great public importance.

Mr. INGALLS. Under the rules I suppose it would come up as unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the next legislative day.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to inquire what the order is in reference to this bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be the unfinished business on the next legislative day.

Mr. LOGAN. What is the proposition; to adjourn?

Mr. INGALLS. The motion to adjourn has been withdrawn. It is now but half past four o'clock, and I believe this bill is pretty well understood, and it would be very agreeable to me if the Senate would kindly consent to finish it this evening. Of course I have no objection to adjournment if the Senate desires to adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I believe it was stated when I asked to lay this bill aside this morning for the purpose of taking up the bounty bill that it would only take half an hour to dispose of it. It has occupied almost the entire day, and the prospects are that it will occupy another day. If this bill is not finished this evening, I shall make the same motion to lay it aside for the purpose of taking up the bounty bill.

Mr. INGALLS. I should be very much gratified, I will say to the Senator from Illinois, personally if the debate should continue and the bill be concluded this evening.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think there is a quorum here now.

Mr. LOGAN. O, yes; more than a quorum.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask unanimous consent to give notice that on the first opportunity I shall ask the Senate to take up the motion submitted by me to reconsider the vote on the bill reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in reference to counting the votes for President and Vice-President, and ask the Senate, without any debate on my part, to vote on the question pending.

Mr. LOGAN. I see there is no disposition to proceed with this bill.

Mr. INGALLS. The bill is under consideration, and the Senator from Ohio made a motion to adjourn, which he temporarily withdrew at the request of some other Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. ALLISON.]

Mr. EDMUNDS. I had risen to speak to that amendment, and, I thought, before the Senator from Ohio did; but I was mistaken about that. I now wish to say about that amendment that, in my opinion, it is as plain a violation of this treaty as any amendment could be drawn if it were designed for that purpose.

Mr. ALLISON. The amendment originally proposed by me?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir; the amendment as it now stands and as it was last read, the one I am asked to vote upon.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not agree to the modification.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was stated to be so modified.

Mr. SARGENT. I understand it is not so modified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the amendment read as it now stands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has not said that the Senator from Iowa accepted the modification. His colleague accepted the modification of the Senator from Massachusetts. The Secretary will read the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa at the right of the Chair, [Mr. ALLISON.]

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And all the remainder of the proceeds of such sales shall be covered into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. ALLISON. Read the original amendment as proposed by me.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

And all the remainder of the proceeds of such sales shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the civilization fund provided for by the treaty concluded between the United States and the Great and Little Osage tribe of Indians, September 29, 1865, and proclaimed January 21, 1867.

Mr. EDMUNDS. To that amendment I have no objection.

Mr. SHERMAN. If in order I move my amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not in order. There are already two amendments pending. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the right of the Chair [Mr. ALLISON] to the amendment of his colleague, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa to the left of the Chair, [Mr. WRIGHT.] Now a further amendment is in order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot move it without striking out some part of what has been already adopted.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You can fix it in the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will reserve it till then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, [Mr. WRIGHT.]

The question was put, and the Chair declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask for a division. I do not think the object of the amendment can be understood or it would not be voted down. I do not understand that there is any difference between my amendment and the bill as it stands except that the section as it stands leaves it in the power of the Secretary of the Treasury to pay not only these fees but all other costs and expenses, including the costs and expenses of the suit itself. My object is to confine it to legitimate purposes. Whether this ought to be paid at all is another question. That is a question of course to be determined afterward. If the object is to have the section as objectionable as possible rather than have it perfected, I can understand the vote.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to inquire is the Senator's amendment an amendment to the section in the bill?

Mr. WRIGHT. It is a substitute for the section.

Mr. HOWE. I understand the Senator to say that his motion is to strike out the section in the bill and to insert his proposition. When we have agreed to his amendment we shall have put his measure into the bill.

Mr. WRIGHT. I do not understand it so.

Mr. HOWE. Am I right?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion pending by the Senator from Vermont to strike out the section. This is a motion to perfect the section.

Mr. HOWE. Then a motion to strike out will still be in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That motion is pending and the Senate is now perfecting the section. Before the motion to strike out is put the question is on the amendment of the Senator from Iowa to section 8.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on striking out the section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the question now is on striking out this attorney-fees section.

Mr. INGALLS. Why not let us vote on that?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is what I propose to do, but we have been off on so many other things that I propose to say a word on that topic.

Mr. INGALLS. I beg pardon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My honorable friend from Kansas seemed to be somewhat industrious in saying that he had been tempted with an offer of a retainer in this celebrated cause and scorned the bribe.

Mr. INGALLS. "Industrious," did the Senator say?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said I thought the Senator was somewhat industrious.

Mr. INGALLS. Did he hear me say that but once?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I said I thought the Senator was industrious, as he always is, which seemed to imply possibly that some other Senator like myself who did argue this cause in the Supreme Court of the United States had positively been guilty of what he styled an indelicacy on the subject. I do not propose to defend here my conduct in that particular respect, but only to admit most freely that the Senator's sense of delicacy and mine, if it stood on exactly the same point, differ a little.

Mr. INGALLS. Did the Senator understand me as impugning his motives?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I did, certainly; otherwise I should not have alluded to it. If I misunderstood the Senator, then most certainly I apologize for what I have already said. If I did not misunderstand him, that is another thing.

Mr. INGALLS. The old maxim about "a guilty conscience," I make no application of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator is unquestionably aware of all the old maxims about guilty consciences. We cannot contest the palm with him on that score. I admit that.

Mr. INGALLS. I made no application to the Senator at all; no allusion to him.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I agree to that then. Now, Mr. President, I come to the point, and that is to provide by this bill that what is confessed to be, stated to be, admitted to be a private arrangement between private parties and their counsel shall be made the subject of a statute of the United States which commands—and of course, like all statutes, speaks by its own force—commands a particular settlement to be made between these parties and their counsel. As has been stated over and over again by some of the gentlemen who are in interest in this thing, the United States is under no obligation whatever to them or to anybody else, except its own officers, about this business; but, as in all cases of importance where there are private interests involved, the United States officials authorize, allow private counsel to appear and argue the cause. Now, I venture to say that this is the first instance in the history of this country, or any other that has a civilization fund as this treaty talks about, of undertaking by a statute of the United States to arrange and settle a question of this kind. It is wrong, in my opinion, in principle. It would be wrong in this case in practice, because, as has already been stated, some settlers on these 960,000 acres of land bought their land of the party that was not promoting this suit and whose interests, therefore, were directly involved in resisting it, whose title the State of Kansas and the railway company were endeavoring to protect.

Now, this tax or whatever you call it applies to every section and every acre of all the lands, no matter under what title claimed or under what title held, and every man, whether he was a party to this agreement with counsel, be it what it may, either for a share in the spoils or for some compensation to be fixed by some other rule, is required to pay fifteen cents an acre to this new civilization fund for the counsel. Well, Mr. President, if that is just legislation, I do not understand what just legislation is. But I do not want to take up the time about it except to restate the point.

Mr. WRIGHT. I only wish to make one suggestion. I think the propriety or impropriety of this section in some form depends upon a question that lies back of it, and that is whether the relations of the United States to these counsel can by possibility be such that ultimately the Government may be liable for their fees.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It has been stated over and over again by one of the gentlemen himself, as we all know the fact is, that the United States has no relation to them at all.

Mr. WRIGHT. That is the very question that I suppose to be in controversy, whether we all do know it as a fact.

Mr. CONKLING. May I inquire of the Senator from Iowa what fact he has in mind leading to any question on that subject, what starts that inquiry?

Mr. WRIGHT. This bill recites on its face as coming from the House that the retainer was at the instance of the United States, as the bill stands, and I therefore supposed that there was some warrant for it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not a particle.

Mr. WRIGHT. The difficulty I have in the case is that I think at the very earliest moment possible we ought to adopt legislation that shall secure these settlers in their titles, and we ought to settle it in such way as by no fair possibility the United States can be again troubled touching these titles or anything in connection with them. Now, if it be true that by any possibility the United States are to be made liable for the fees of these attorneys, and if the settlers themselves are agreed to pay this sum so that the United States shall be protected, then I think it would be fair that it should be done; but if it be true that there is no state of case where by possibility the Government can be made liable ever to these attorneys, then this section ought to be struck out at once, and there to me is the very turning point in the case.

Mr. CONKLING. May I ask the Senator what part of this bill recites that the counsel were employed at the instance of the United States. I see at line 12, on page 6, these words:

> Said expenses to include the fees justly due to the attorneys retained at the instance of the settlers on said land, with the approval of the Attorney-General of the United States.

Mr. WRIGHT. That was the language to which I referred.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to inquire of the Senator, as he is an older and better lawyer than I am, whether if he or any other counsel appears in a case in which the United States is a party, suing by its regular district attorney, there must not be from the court, or from the Attorney-General, or at least from the district attorney himself, some approval. A man might go on as amicus curiæ to aid the court; but if he appears as counsel in a case in which the United States is complainant and in which the solicitor is the regular district attorney of the United States or the Attorney-General, I take it he must do it with the approval of his associate, or the official superiors of his associate. I did not therefore understand when I heard that language read before, if it be the language to which the Senator refers, that there was anything there which raised an assumpsit against the Attorney-General, or against the United States which he represented. The allegation is that the assumpsit was on the part of the settlers and that the appearance in the case of these counsel was with the approval of the Attorney-General.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have not suggested and I do not wish to be understood as having suggested that it did raise an assumpsit on the part of the United States. I was discussing the matter as a question of fact as to what the actual facts or circumstances were with reference to such a case.

Mr. CONKLING. But, if the Senator will pardon me, when I asked him what started that doubt in his mind, he said the bill as it came to us from the House recited the fact, and that is what surprised me, and I am trying to ascertain whether there is such recital.

Mr. WRIGHT. It would be strange to me that there should be a bill of this kind passed by the House with this language unless there was some claim of some person that there was an ultimate liability. I do not assume any such liability, but it is because of a possibility that there may be such an ultimate liability that I think we ought to so frame this legislation as to protect the Government in the end, if we can. If there is no liability, then this section had better go out at once; because I agree with what has been said here as to the very great impropriety of having legislation that is looking to taking care of and protecting a contract between counsel and private citizens. With that we have nothing to do.

Mr. HOWE. I wish to make a suggestion to the Senator. If there is a liability on the part of the Government of the United States to pay these counsel fees, is it not liable to be known either to counsel or to the Government or to both?

Mr. WRIGHT. I should think so.

Mr. HOWE. If it is known to both, cannot the Government pay these fees without any such legislation as this? If it is known to the counsel and not to the Government, cannot the counsel go into the Court of Claims and make that liability patent to the Government, and so get their pay and have the account settled? Then in what possible view can this section be required?

Mr. WRIGHT. Only in this view, that if there should be liability on the part of the Government these settlers are willing on their part to pay an additional sum so as to protect the Government. Then it would seem to me but right and fair to provide that they should pay it in this way, for this reason: I understand that these settlers can do it without any legislation; but as I understand the object of the section, it is that there shall be an assessment made on all of them and not leave it to those who may be willing to pay and let those who may be unwilling to pay avoid it.

Mr. HOWE. If this section be stricken from the bill, will there not be other provisions of the bill which will still require the $1.40 an acre to be paid?

Mr. WRIGHT. Yes, but there is no provision as to how it shall be disposed of.

Mr. HOWE. Is it material to the United States whether $20,000 or $50,000 which is to be paid to counsel shall be taken out of this identical fund or some other?

Mr. WRIGHT. Except this, if this fund was paid in without any direction as to how it should be expended, it would be all appropriated to the civilization fund and all be expended there, and we should have to pay the balance of the sum to the attorneys ultimately.

Mr. HOWE. But if we take the $50,000 out of the civilization fund to pay these fees, we shall have to take out of the ordinary revenues of the Government a great many times $50,000 for the civilization fund.

Mr. WRIGHT. That raises a question of very much doubt in connection with this matter, for I have great doubt whether any portion of this excess can by any fair reasoning be regarded as proceeds of the land within the meaning of the treaty; but I do not care to get into that discussion at present. My only inquiry was and the only doubt I have had is as to the question of fact. If there be no pretense and no fair ground for claiming that these attorneys can have any claim against the Government, I see no reason for this section.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator from Iowa will just look at the Revised Statutes he will see that at least we ought to have an affirmative report from a committee before we undertake to regulate by force of law the private rights between clients and counsel and make everybody pay whether he has retained counsel or not. Section 363 of the Revised Statutes states:

> The Attorney-General shall, whenever in his opinion the public interest requires it, employ and retain, in the name of the United States, such attorneys and counselors at law as he may think necessary to assist the district attorneys in the discharge of their duties, and shall stipulate with such assistant attorneys and counsel the amount of compensation, and shall have supervision of their conduct and proceedings.

Then section 366 provides:

> Every attorney or counselor who is specially retained, under the authority of the Department of Justice, to assist in the trial of any case in which the Government is interested, shall receive a commission from the head of such Department, as a special assistant to the Attorney-General, or to some one of the district attorneys, as the nature of the appointment may require; and shall take the oath required by law to be taken by the district attorneys, and shall be subject to all the liabilities imposed upon them by law.

Then there is another provision that no compensation shall be allowed to anybody in any case except in conformity with this requirement and on the certificate of the Attorney-General. Had there been any pretense that this law had been complied with and anything else than the simple fact stated the other day by the parties in interest that the Attorney-General had allowed the counsel of the persons who were litigating their claims to appear in a cause in which the United States was a party to the record, as is done every day where there are private interests, we should have heard of it most certainly. The statute requires a public and formal appointment by commission with a stipulated fee and an oath by the party and a certificate, and that upon it he has to get his pay. There is no pretense whatever that any such state of facts exists.

Mr. WRIGHT. I trust my friend from Vermont has not understood me at any time to say or intimate that I regarded that there was any such retainer here as made the Government liable as matter of law, as the case now stands; but he knows with myself that frequently it occurs that although there is no technical legal liability nevertheless claims are pressed and pressed from time to time by counsel and by other persons upon Congress. It was because I feared that by possibility there might be such a claim here, so reasonably well founded as that they could press the claim, that I desired if possible to protect the Government.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But I suggest to my friend that this section, instead of providing against such a difficulty, really raises the liability that we do not want to acknowledge, and we become responsible as a trustee to see that they get whatever these settlers have agreed.

Mr. WRIGHT. As it stands; but I think if it is to pass at all it ought to be in a different form. It ought to be changed. I do not say there is any real necessity for section 8.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 26, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Howe, Kernan, Key, McDonald, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Paddock, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, and Windom—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Clayton, Cockrell, Ferry, Harvey, Ingalls, Kelly, Logan, McCreery, Sherman, Wallace, and Wright—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bogy, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Merrimon, Morton, Norwood, Patterson, Sharon Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, West, Whyte, and Withers—34.

So the amendment of Mr. EDMUNDS was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. As the price was raised in the bill from 25 to $1. $1.40 per acre upon the theory of the assessment of fifteen cents to pay these fees, and as that section is now striken out, I move that the word "forty," where it occurs in the bill in sections 1, 3, and 4, be stricken out and "twenty-five" inserted, so that the price of the lands shall be $1.25 per acre. The word occurs in line 14 of section 1, line 4 of section 3, and in line 15 of section 4.

Mr. HOWE. I want to ask the Senator one question; I do not want to argue the matter. Why is it not just as fair for all the settlers to pay $1.40 for these lands, although the Government does not pay the counsel fees, as it would be for the settlers to pay $1.40 who did not concur in employing the counsel but who had an interest or claimed an interest in the land adverse to that which the counsel were employed to defend?

Mr. INGALLS. Simply because the joint resolution of April 10, 1869, provides that the lands shall be sold at the price of $1.25 per acre.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Within two years.

Mr. HOWE. What excuse is there in the act of 1869 for levying fifteen cents on those settlers who claim under the railroad title?

Mr. INGALLS. I have repeatedly stated that that was a voluntary act on the part of the settlers themselves to consent to that imposition for the purposes that have been repeatedly stated.

Mr. HOWE. What is the evidence of the assent of that portion of the settlers?

Mr. INGALLS. My statement, so far as it goes.

Mr. HOWE. The Senator states it as a matter of fact himself.

Mr. INGALLS. I have stated on this floor that I heard no objection to it from any source whatever.

Mr. HOWE. That may be satisfactory evidence. It is suggested by my friend from New York that there may be some portion of these settlers who claim under the railroad grant who really thought that they might rely upon the faith of the United States, and therefore it was not necessary for them to employ counsel.

Mr. INGALLS. Those persons who claimed under the railroad grant in many cases have paid the railroads for their lands. By this bill they are required to pay one dollar and a quarter more. Does the Senator think it is just to them to impose an additional fifteen cents on the price they are to pay?

Mr. HOWE. No; but the Senator proposes to impose fifteen cents additional.

Mr. INGALLS. But I have been overruled by the Senate.

Mr. HOWE. Not at all. The Senate have simply voted that it is not fair to take this trust fund to pay the counsel fees, but they have not yet voted that it is not fair to pay $1.40 for this land.

Mr. INGALLS. Very well, sir; I do not wish to discuss it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Kansas, [Mr. INGALLS.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. Section 5 provides—

That all entries heretofore made of any of said lands, and set aside or canceled by the Secretary of the Interior, on the ground that the said railroads had a prior grant of said lands, be restored by the said Secretary of the Interior upon the payment by each purchaser to the receiver of the proper land office the sum of fifteen cents per acre in addition to the sum heretofore paid, to cover in part the expense incurred in litigating the title to said land set up by said railroads.

The action of the Senate renders it necessary to strike out the remainder of the section after the word "Interior" in line 5. I move to strike that out and insert:

Subject to any valid adverse claim that may have accrued before or since such cancellation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not want to interfere with my friend's bill any more than is absolutely necessary; but it strikes me that we have now less than a quorum, and in order to ascertain that I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. LOGAN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion. I should like, if it be agreeable to the Senate, to have a short executive session.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The difficulty is, we have not a quorum.

Mr. LOGAN. There will be no objection to referring some matters in executive session; I do not ask for any formal vote.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Very well; I will withdraw the motion for that purpose.

Mr. LOGAN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. I am aware that that motion is not debatable; but there are but one or two more amendments that will be required to perfect this bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have one of considerable importance.

Mr. LOGAN. My only object is to have an executive session before adjournment. If the Senate will finish the bill I shall much prefer that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does the Senator withdraw his motion?

Mr. LOGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, there being on a division—ayes 20, noes 17; and (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 28, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Under the order made by the House a few days ago——

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise for the purpose of resuming the floor upon a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On yesterday, just before the adjournment, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] held the floor upon the contested-election case of Platt vs. Goode, and yielded to the gentleman from West Virginia, who moved an adjournment. The regular order being called for, the privileged order for this morning is the contested-election case, upon which the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I ask the Chair to allow me for a moment to call his attention to the wording of the order of the House in reference to the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Certainly.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. If I remember aright, it was that that report should be the special order after reading of the Journal to-day "to the exclusion of all other business."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the same order which is made whenever a special order is made by the House; and the Chair will say that these special orders are made too frequently. The regular order this morning is a question of the highest privilege, the right of a member to a seat in this House.

Mr. WHITTHORE. Then I would inquire if, in the event that the contested-election case is now taken up, upon which I understand the debate is limited to two hours, the order to which I refer will then be the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will unquestionably give the gentleman the floor at that time for the purpose of bringing up his regular order, which, however, will be subject to the question of consideration. The Chair only promises to do that on condition that no question of higher privilege is raised. Gentlemen must understand that at the end of a session these privileged questions accumulate very largely on the Calendar.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I am very anxious to have that report of the Committee on Naval Affairs considered as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman for his special order, if there is nothing else in the way.

Mr. HALE. I wish to state that there is a desire on both sides represented in this case that the report of the Naval Committee shall come up as early as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair supposes there will be ample time for its consideration.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have consented to yield to some gentlemen to make formal reports, if I do not thereby lose my right to the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If no objection is made on the part of the House and no demand for the regular order, the Chair will recognize a few gentlemen for special purposes, leaving the gentleman from Virginia to hold the floor.

Mr. DE BOLT. I rise to make a privileged report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think at this stage of the session we should have the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being demanded, the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] will proceed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I have agreed to yield twenty-five minutes of the time allotted to me to the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE.]

Mr. HARTRIDGE not appearing in his seat,

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I am willing to yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DE BOLT] to make his report.

Many MEMBERS. "The regular order!"

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called for, the genleman from Virginia [Mr. HARRIS] must proceed or yield the floor entirely. The Chair would be glad to recognize the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. DE BOLT,] but the regular order being called for the Chair cannot do it

ELECTION CONTEST—PLATT VS. GOODE.

The House resumed the consideration of the contested-election case of James H. Platt, jr., vs. John Goode, jr., from the second congressional district of Virginia.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. In the absence of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. HARTRIDGE,] to whom I agreed to yield a portion of my time, I will now proceed to open the discussion this morning.

It may not be amiss for me to state that I congratulate the House that this is the last of the series of contested-election cases which have come before this House, except some in regard to which there is no difference of opinion in the Committee of Elections. It may not be inappropriate for me on this occasion, as the chairman of that committee, to return my thanks to its members for the very kind, attentive, industrious, and intelligent investigation which they have made of the various cases referred to them.

It was my intention at the beginning of the session, aided by the other members of the Committee of Elections, to do what has not been done for many years so far as I recollect, to finish up all the contested-election cases at the first session of Congress, and thus avoid the postponement of cases until the last few days of the term, as has been too common, by which the incumbent of the seat, if finally turned out, drew his pay to the end of the Congress, and the incoming member drew his pay back from the beginning of the Congress; thus making a double drain on the Treasury when there is but one Representative in Congress.

I feel that I cannot express too profoundly my gratitude to the committee which has so ably and faithfully sustained me. At the same time, while the members of the committee must feel a consciousness of having done their duty, their labors on the committee have been such as to withdraw them in a great degree from active participation in the duties of the House. Those who have served on that committee know that the labors of the committee, like those of a chancellor in chambers, are performed where the world sees or hears them not. I have the satisfaction, moreover, of knowing that our reports have generally been so acceptable as to produce but little discussion and attract but little attention. This case, more than all others, has attracted the attention of the House and the country, and as I proceed to make the closing argument in favor of the minority report which seats my colleague, I shall do so with the consciousness of the responsibility, and shall discharge my duty fairly, candidly, and honestly.

When I undertook to discharge the duties of chairman of the Committee of Elections I was admonished from my practice as a lawyer and my experience on the bench that my duty was not that of a partisan or a mere politician; that the functions to be discharged by that committee are judicial rather than legislative; because we are called upon to decide upon the law and the evidence, and to determine under the Constitution and laws of our country who are entitled to seats upon this floor. Upon the exercise of this duty I entered with honesty of purpose and a determination to follow the dictates of justice without regard to the results that might follow. Sometimes our committee has been divided upon party lines. In previous Congresses there have been cases, I know, in which it must have struck many members that in view of the party lines dividing gentlemen in contested-election cases there must necessarily have been dishonesty on the one side or the other; that each party voted for its man because of his political standing. But, sir, experience has taught me that such a result may well be arrived at with no dishonesty of purpose. Sometimes cases are so equally balanced that the most honest judgments, though agreeing upon party questions, may sincerely differ. Sometimes we find cases before us in which upon the law and the evidence the scale is so equally balanced that personal preference or party predilection would necessarily turn the scale one way or the other. In this way men may honestly divide upon party lines on such questions as on any other.

I maintain that the freedom of election which has been alluded to here is the great palladium of liberty, our only shield and protection. It ought to be maintained inviolate, and he who would seek to impair or defeat the will of a free people legally expressed is an enemy to our institutions. Their perpetuity depends on the purity of the ballot. This purity consists in the free and unrestrained expression of the will of the people through the channels provided by law. While all should be protected in their undisturbed right of franchise, yet it is equally the duty to see that the law is observed and that no one not entitled to vote shall exercise that important privilege.

Mr. Speaker, the allusion which I shall make to the conduct of the contestant in this case will not be with the view of exciting any passion or feeling against him. I will refer to it only as a part of the case as developed before the committee and before the House.

It is shown by the evidence that on a memorable October day, when the people of Virginia, irrespective of party, were assembled to express their opinions upon political questions and to hear their friends speak thereon, the peace and harmony of that Virginia audience was disturbed by the military approach of the contestant. The testimony shows that on the 30th of October the people of the ancient city of Yorktown, which will live in history as long as time shall last, met in political assembly; but upon its becoming known that Hon. James H. Platt was coming up the river in an armed vessel, the colored people who did not agree with him, who had determined to vote for one of their own color, understood that they must get out of the way and go into a back lot. What was the result? Mr. Platt did come up that historic stream, York River, up which Cornwallis came; and doubtless Mr. Platt expected he would have a surrender little less renowned than that of the British commander; this was too in the same month of the year. But Mr. Platt came not to fight the enemies of his country, but to deter those who had hitherto been his political friends, who had belonged to the same political party with himself. I desire to have read, at the risk of being tedious, a portion of the evidence bearing upon this matter. I know that some gentlemen on this floor have some doubt as to how they ought to vote on this question; and although this extract is long, I desire to have it read for the purpose of showing that party lines were drawn upon color in that district. It tends to throw light upon the question how certain illegal colored votes were cast.

The Clerk read as follows:

The morning of the 30th of October we held a consultation together with our friends, soon after the arrival of the steamer from Norfolk with Dr. Bayne and and other gentlemen. This was about one hour and three-quarters before the arrival of the steamer of James H. Platt and friends. We commenced to hold a consultation in front of my store, but before we could conclude we heard the firing of a cannon, and, as I suppose, shot-guns and pistols, which announced the arrival of James H. Platt and friends. I said to Dr. Bayne and my brother, Robert Norton, we had best adjourn and go round in the lot in the rear of the store, where we might be out of the way of Platt and his men as they came up Main street; we did so, and all of our friends met together, and I said to them, it would be best for all of us to stay together during the day and be very careful not to insult any one or have any fuss with Platt's men during that day, and stay down town from his stand. They all agreed to do so. About this time Platt and his company passed up Main street with cannon, double-barreled guns, and new revolvers, all, nearly, having clubs in their hands about two feet long. We waited patiently until they had all passed and then came back in front of the store; as they passed they hallooed and jeered, using very profane language. I brought out a barrel and box for the speakers to stand upon. We then appointed a committee to wait upon Hon. John Goode, jr., and to confer with Platt's committee for a division of time in the discussion which was to take place that day. I was chairman of that committee, and waited upon Mr. Goode, who told the committee he would very cheerfully agree to discuss the questions involved in the canvass with both of the candidates, to which Thomas E. Milstead replied that James H. Platt would not consent to any division of time with Robert Norton; after which I thanked Mr. Goode on behalf of the committee and went back to our stand. Our friends then decided to hold a meeting to ourselves. We put up the flag and erected a temporary stand in front of my store-door. Dr. Bayne got up and commenced speaking. Very soon William E. Crockett and some other Platt men, whose names I do not know, came and pulled the box from under. I fixed up the stand again and attempted to speak myself, but found it impossible to do so, owing to the riot which ha i just commenced by William E. Crockett, a friend of James H. Platt and who came on the steamer with him. He tore the flag down and broke the staff in two pieces, and commenced striking the friends of Robert Norton. I went to him and begged him to be quiet, and told him it would only result in a disturbance, to which he replied, "He did not care a damn; we came here that day prepared to clean Yorktown out." I left him after that and went back to the stand. Very soon afterward I saw him strike a man in front of Dawson's hotel, and several others struck him afterward. He ran up toward Platt s stand, hallooing at the top of his voice, "Let us have the cannon and we will rake the streets!" About the time he got half way up the street he was met by at least fifty men, all armed with revolvers and bowie-knives, who followed Crockett back down the street; one of them a magistrate of Warwick County, by the name of Ferdinand Harrison, who fired a revolver promiscuously in the crowd and shot a man in the shoulder, whose wound I examined and dressed afterward. Another shot was fired, striking a man named Holmes in the leg, whose wound I examined and dressed also. By this time our friends all decided to leave the stand and go around where Hon John Goode was speaking, in order that we might protect ourselves from the mob. While we were crossing the street, a stout, portly looking white man, wearing a badge, hallooed out, "There goes Bob Norton now. By God, we want to carry his heart on a stick to-day." I told Robert Norton to keep close to Henry Diggs, who was in front of me, and I would protect him from the mob through the street. When we got around the corner Mr. Goode was speaking. About twenty-five or thirty of Platt's men came around the corner, where the stand of Mr. Goode was, making a furious noise, howling and using their revolvers freely in the crowd. I called upon the sheriff and asked him to arrest these men. He told me that he was perfectly powerless; that the mob was so great that he could not do anything. By this time Mr. Goode concluded his speech, and I asked the privilege of occupying the stand, which was granted. I had not been speaking more than ten minutes before some three or four white men and one colored man, all of whom came on the steamer with James H. Platt and friends, they came up to the stand and said to me, "We would like to have a little talk with you." I said to them, "I cannot leave the stand, but you can tell me here what business you have with me." I leaned over the end of the stand so that I might hear what they had to say. I had scarcely leaned my head over before I felt something against the left side of my chest. I looked around and saw one of the men with a revolver in his hand pointing it right against my breast. I asked him if that was the business he had with me. He replied, "By God, we will kill every damn one of you that don't vote for Platt." I commenced speaking again, and the riot commenced on the right of the stand, in front of Frank Cook's shoe-shop. I undertook to fix some way by which I could step out of the stand to get to Frank Cook's shop, in order that I might get him to let some females in his shop who were very much frightened and were right in the crowd where they were shooting. I found it impossible, for the crowd by this time was so great that I could not pass. I found all had left the stand except myself, when three or four Platt men said to me, "Damn you, we want you to leave this shebang; we are going to run it ourselves."

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. Now, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that this is the evidence, not of a conservative or white man, but of a colored man—Dr. Morton, a brother of the then candidate for Congress in opposition to Mr. Platt. It will be seen that on that day Mr. Platt came up the river in a Government vessel armed with cannon; that the men of his party carried muskets, pistols, and clubs, and that the flotilla touched the shore. Commander Platt took his position on land; ordered his forces to disembark. Surrounded by the boys in blue, amid the roar of cannon and the clangor of small-arms, the shout of faithful followers, backed by "the best Government the world ever saw," like Roderick Dhu, then—

> One blast upon his bugle-horn
> Were worth a thousand men.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there stood James H. Platt, desecrating the sacred soil of Yorktown, with armed men, with music, with banners flying, with all the pomp and circumstance of war.

> His back against a rock he bore,
> And firmly placed his foot before:
> "Come one, come all! this rock shall fly
> From its firm base as soon as I."

All this show, all this pomp, all this military display was intended to frighten the poor colored people, whose friend he pretended to be, and to create the impression in their minds that he was backed by all the power of the Government, and that if they voted for Norton ruin was their doom. He contended it was a mere gala-day entertainment.

If so, why did he land his cannon and march through the streets of Yorktown to the strains of martial music, with banners flying? No, sir, the effort was to terrify the colored people—to let them knbw that they would not be allowed to vote the democratic or conservative ticket, or the colored ticket headed by Norton. I commend to the attention of my friends of my own party who disagree with me on this question the fact that party lines were so strictly drawn, not only between the white and colored people, but between Mr. Platt, the nominee of the republican party, and Mr. Norton, the independent colored republican, that human life was not safe where a colored man promised or indicated that he would not vote for Mr. Platt.

There is another point in that testimony. Mr. Page stated: I saw at least twenty-five chasing one man, firing pistol-shots as they went." The testimony of Mr. Page I refer to from memory. He is a gentleman of high character and standing. He said, the day before the election a colored man who had voted for Kemper, the democratic candidate for governor the year before, came to him in great alarm and trepidation and said that his life was threatened, that he was endangered because they expected he would vote for Norton, or the democratic candidate. Mr. Page said: "If you have no more nerve than that, go to the polls early in the morning to-morrow and vote the republican ticket and let them see you vote it in order that you may go home in peace and make a valuable work-hand if nothing else. Let the republicans see you vote for the republican ticket so you may have peace and your life may be spared."

Mr. PLATT, (the contestant.) For whom did he vote?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I do not know how he voted, but the negro said he was happy; and thanked God that that course would save his life. The evidence does not contradict that statement anywhere and I presume he voted for you.

I desire to have read, sir, the charge of a colored minister of the gospel in that district to show what control they had over their flocks in regard to voting. It will prove conclusively to every gentleman present, who has any doubt, that no colored man in that congressional district could have voted for John Goode and remained safe in life and limb. I hope gentlemen will listen to it.

I think that improper appliances were used and resorted to to compel the colored voters to vote solidly the republican ticket. The night before the election one of the colored men employed by me upon the Brandon farm came into our dining-room and sought a private interview. He was one who had voted with me in the Kemper campaign for the Kemper ticket. I asked him what he wanted; he said, "Well, sir, to-morrow is the day of election." I remarked, "Are you going to vote with me for Mr. Goode this time?" He replied, "You know I have always voted with you, because I believe you know what is best, but I dare not do it this time." I answered, "Why?" He replied, "Well, Mr. Page, you don't know, but God knows, what I've been through since the time I went with you to the polls and voted with you." I asked him if anybody had troubled him for so voting at the Kemper election. He said, "Well, sir, nobody has put their hands on me, but I have had no peace from some of these people since." I asked him to speak plain; to tell me the whole truth, who had troubled him. He said, "You don't know, but when you were in Richmond they had me up last Saturday night, and didn't they tell John Roane that I was one, and Edmund, the cook in the kitchen, was another, and old man Henry, that's dead out yonder now, was the other who went with you in the carriage and to the polls and voted the conservative ticket. But that was the last time that they would ever dare to do that, and if they did vote this time the same way, well, nobody wouldn't want to vote after that." Such was his terror and trembling condition that I told him that if he was such a fool as to be scared by such threats, why to go out early in the morning and vote the Platt ticket, so they would know how he had voted, which would relieve him from his frightened condition and make him serviceable as a hand. He replied, "Thank God for that, for then I may be allowed to live." And he did go and so vote.

About a week or two weeks, I don't recollect which, before the election, John Smith, the colored preacher, living, I believe, in Hampton or thereabouts, paid a special visit, not being his regular Sunday appointment which he has at the Brandon chapel, and held his special services. I understand from colored attendants, the truth of which I do not know personally, he preached from the text, "Sinners, look upon your minister and obey his commandments!" And in that sermon he told them it was their duty to vote for Mr. Platt or leave the church. The Monday after that Sunday, while I was at the Brandon wharf waiting for the boat, he came down to take the boat to go down the river; I don't know where he was going. There were a good many voters at that time at and on the Brandon wharf, engaged in loading a schooner with wood. He was soon surrounded by them. In and among that number was a colored hand who had come across the river from the Charles City side. I personally heard with my own ears the conversation between Smith and this minister, so called, from the other side of the river. He said to Smith: "I was very sorry, brother, that I couldn't be with you last Sunday, so I come down this morning to find exactly how we must go and what we must do in the election that we are going to have for Congress, 'cause a good many across my side the river is of an opinion dat we's gwine to support our own color, Mr. Norton." Smith says: "No, brother, don't touch him, for I'm here now to give light to de children of God, that they may walk straight through the fiery bush;" and all said "Amen, the salvation of our people."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make some application of that testimony. There are 90 votes cast in this election which are illegal. Seventy-eight were colored, 12 white. The distribution of those votes by the minority of the democratic members—for I am compelled to use the term to distinguish gentlemen on the committee—does Mr. Goode great injustice. How do they divide the 78 colored votes? There were 78 votes cast by colored persons who had no right to vote. That is conceded by both parties. Indeed there are three reports in this case, the majority and minority, and minority of the majority.

They all say there were 78 colored and 12 white votes which were cast illegally at that election. These votes are conceded to be illegal, but we cannot tell how they voted. Therefore the majority say, we will subtract them pro rata from Goode and Platt, thus taking from Goode 29 votes and from Platt 64, in the very face of the fact that to all human certainty, as positively as if we had seen them vote, every one of these 78 illegal colored votes were cast for Platt. We cannot prove under our laws how a man voted, but we can prove that the vote was illegal. The question then recurs, how did they vote? What is the evidence to convince the judgment of a right-thinking man? The law does not require, the moral law does not require, absolute and positive proof.

Now, sir, I can make application on this floor in reference to any party question. Suppose we voted by ballot instead of viva voce, could you not to a moral certainty say how any colored Representative upon this floor voted upon a party question? There is no doubt of it. I say this in no disparagement, for the same thing could be said in reference to any white republican. The republican on a party question would vote with his party, as the democratic and conservative member would vote with his party.

Mr. PLATT, (contestant.) Will the gentleman permit me to ask him a question? Do I understand the gentleman as saying that by dividing the votes on the color line Mr. Goode is elected by 5 majority?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No; I know what the gentleman is coming to. He wants to know how I divide the vote between Norton and Platt. I will take the division between Norton and Platt given by the minority of the majority report, because I think that is right. In one or two precincts Norton got some votes. We give to Norton the ratio of the colored vote as between him and Platt. That is the way we divide it. On the other hand, the minority of this committee take the colored vote and divide it in this way: they count all the white vote for Goode and all the colored vote for Norton and Platt, in proportion to the vote received by them. And under that subdivision it gives Norton 7, Platt 72, and Goode 12. The ratio between them is in proportion to the vote they received; that is, Platt and Norton; and we take from Goode the whole white vote and charge him with it.

Well, sir, is that right? You have got to dispose of these votes. We have no right to make votes. We have no right to say how men voted unless we have some absolute moral certainty on the subject. But the law says, and I commend it to the attention of the House, that if it can be ascertained for whom the illegal vote was cast it must be taken from that party; and this may be shown by circumstantial evidence. McCrary, in his Law of Elections, page 224, says:

We see how important it is that it should, if possible, be made to appear either by direct or circumstantial evidence for whom each illegal vote was cast.

Again, the law says in the absence of proof as to how the illegal votes were cast then they may be disposed of as the majority report does.

Is there absence of proof here? Is there absence of proof how the colored men voted, when it is shown that Platt came with his men, with guns and pistols, and warned the men not to violate party discipline as he laid it down? Is there absence of proof when the colored ministers came to them telling them the road to heaven was through the Platt ballot-box, and that hell was their portion if they voted for Norton? No one ever pretended they would vote for Goode.

This is laid down as the cardinal principle. If it can be done, it shall if possible be made to appear, either by direct or circumstantial evidence, how these illegal votes were cast. Now, I ask any gentleman on this floor if the circumstance that Platt was the regular republican candidate, if the circumstance as the evidence shows on this record that the colored people as a body voted for Platt, if the circumstance that the colored preachers and ministers of the Gospel, and that Platt, with guns and cannon bearing upon the colored voters, are not sufficient to make a case of circumstantial evidence to convince any right-thinking man that the colored vote was cast for Platt? If you do not take this view, Mr. Speaker, you take from Mr. Goode votes to which he is entitled. He only got 12 white votes; the presumption is that the 12 were cast for him. Yet my friends of the majority take from him thirty-odd votes, thus making it worse for Goode than if no illegal votes had been cast at all. I say you are called upon to act just as you would if a party vote had been taken in this House by ballot; you are called upon to say on your oaths, according to your best judgment, how these men voted. And you know, as well as you can morally know any fact on earth, that these votes were given for James H. Platt, excepting a few that were cast for Mr. Norton. And that leaves, according to my calculation, Mr. Goode elected.

I come next, Mr. Speaker, to discuss 13 votes which have not been referred to by either party, because they are not necessary from their view of the case to affect the result, and I want the attention of the House to this point. In one county in the district there were 206 votes cast; 193 of them were on ballots printed, "For Congress, James H. Platt," and the words "against constitutional amendments."

The law of Virginia says—and I desire the lawyers of the House to listen to me—in such cases the ballots for Congress and on the constitution shall be in separate boxes; that there should be a box for the ballots on the constitutional amendments and a box for the ballots for Congress separate and apart. But in the congressional box were found 193 ballots containing the name of James H. Platt and the words "against constitutional amendments." Those votes by all parties have been counted for James H. Platt. How could they determine for what purpose these votes were intended to be cast, whether for Platt, or against the constitutional amendments? You cannot tell for your life with any moral certainty whether the voter meant to put his ticket in the constitutional box or whether he thought he was putting it in the congressional box. Yet out of leniency and abundance of caution, out of respect for the suffrage, these votes were all counted for James H. Platt. Yet we are charged with trying upon technicalities to deprive a man of his vote, when, if we had sought to rely upon technicalities and not upon the law and evidence in the case, there was, goodness knows, provocation enough to justify us in throwing out these and many other votes.

Well, sir, but there were in the same precinct 13 ballots which had each a second ballot folded within them; one being for James H. Platt and the other against the constitutional amendments. Now what does our law say upon that subject? The law is either mandatory or directory. As regards the 193 votes I have referred to, the law says the ballots shall be deposited in a certain box. But it does not say that those not deposited in that box shall be destroyed. Therefore the committee construed it to be directory, and counted the votes for Platt. As to these other ballots which were folded the one within the other, and which have not been taken from him, I will read to you what the law says, and we will see if the law does not make it mandatory, commanding the commissioners of election to destroy the ballots. The local commissioners destroyed all these ballots, and that action went through the whole of these 206 votes. But the committee put them back. We will see if the committee did right in putting them back. The law directs how the ballot-box shall be opened and how the vote shall be counted, and then it says:

Then if upon a comparison of the said count with the number of names of electors on the poll-books it appears that two ballots folded together were cast by the same person, they shall be destroyed. (Code 1873, page 160.)

I call upon my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. THOMPSON,] astute lawyer as he is, to say whether that is not mandatory. And I call upon him to say whether giving those votes to Platt is not in violation of the law which says that ballots being found folded one within the other shall be destroyed. The commissioners had no choice.

Now, sir, I pass for a moment to the consideration of the navy-yard. I say so far from any illiberality having been shown to the contestant he has been treated with the utmost liberality. Technicalities have been thrown out of the way; objection after objection has been overruled, as if the minority of the committee with the majority were seeking how to seat the contestant. For myself, in the consideration of these cases I know of no difference between political friends and political foes. But I refer you to the vote in the cities of Norfolk and Portsmouth and in the navy-yard precincts. Why not apply the same rule in this case as we did in the case of Le Moyne vs. Farwell? In the Illinois case the law of the State required that every voter should be registered and his number and name marked upon the ballot, and therefore when we came to examine the polls we struck out the illegal voters. But in our State we require registration to be made, but no marks to be put upon the ballots to show how any man voted. It is shown that 561 of these navy-yard employés cast their suffrages for James H. Platt. If we had been disposed to be illiberal we should have stricken off these votes instead of throwing out the whole poll, which would have left Goode a majority of 100 votes in the navy-yard precincts. But the testimony of witnesses as to the number of those who voted was too indefinite for us to attempt to purge the poll, and therefore we thought it better to follow the law and strike out the entire vote of those precincts, by which Goode lost 100 votes. I desire to read to the House a summary of this case, as follows:

Whole vote for Platt and Goode, as shown by Messrs. THOMPSON and HOUSE, less the navy-yard and the 90 illegal votes:

For Platt	14,583
For Goode	14,083
Majority for Platt	500
From which deduct Platt's majority at navy-yard	441
Platt's majority, as shown by above gentlemen, less the 90 illegal votes	59
To overcome this, take the votes polled together in Nansemond contrary to mandatory law	13
Platt's proportion of the 90 illegal votes	59
Majority for Goode	13

In disposing of the 90 illegal votes I have adopted this plan: Take from Goode all the illegal white votes—12; from Platt and Norton all the illegal colored vote in proportion to the aggregate vote each received at the precincts where the illegal colored votes were cast. This takes from Platt 79, from Norton 7, from Goode 12; leaving 59 more bad votes for Platt than Goode.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think it must be manifest to every member of the House who has examined this question impartially that Goode was fairly and honestly elected according to the laws of Virginia and the laws governing this House, and I hope that even my two friends on the committee who have come to the conclusion that their division of the 90 illegal votes was a hasty and ill-devised division, and that they ought to have been divided on the color line, because the testimony shows that party lines were drawn sharp and close in this election between Platt and Goode. The testimony shows inferentially that not a single colored man in the district voted for Goode. Are you going to give him thirty odd illegal votes out of the 90, when the testimony shows that not a single colored man voted for him? If you adopt the majority report, you make 52 colored men vote for Goode, when you know in your heart of hearts that not a single colored man voted for him. To sanction the seating of Platt you must give that vote to Goode under the solemnity of the oath you have taken, and I do not believe that there is a man here who believes that a single colored vote was cast for John Goode.

Mr. Speaker, I am done. I return my thanks to the House for the attention they have paid to my remarks.

Mr. WILSON, of West Virginia. Before the gentleman takes his seat I desire to ask him whether Mr. Platt has taken any evidence tending to show that any colored votes were cast for Mr. Goode in the district?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. There is no evidence on the record tending to show that any colored man in the district voted for Goode, and I do not think that the contestant or any of his friends would dare to say that any colored vote was cast for John Goode; and yet they call upon the House to say that 32 colored men voted for him out of 90.

Mr. Speaker, I was about remarking I have done my duty. I have examined this case fairly and impartially. I have so with an eye solely to do right, as I understand it. If it shall be the judgment of the House to sustain me, I shall be more than gratified; but if not, then their will, not mine, be done.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROWN, of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I shall occupy but a moment, and that only as a personal explanation. I desire to read from the notice of contest of Mr. Platt in this case:

Your agents, friends, and partisans aforesaid, for and with money, whisky, and other valuable things, paid, delivered, and furnished, and promised to him, did hire and bribe one Robert Norton, a resident of said county, to promote and advance your election by falsely pretending and representing himself to be a candidate of the republican or radical party for Representative in Congress.

* * * * * * *

I shall prove that one barrel of whisky was sent to said Norton by William F. Allen, who was a conservative superintendent in the city of Norfolk; that $100 in money was sent and paid to said Norton by and upon the check of said Allen for that amount; that the additional sum of $100 was sent and paid to said Norton by and upon the check of William M. Chaplain, esq., who is your law-partner; and that other sums of money and other things were sent and paid and furnished to said Norton by the recognized committee-men, authorities, and exponents of the conservative party in Norfolk City. I shall also prove that large sums of money were at different times paid and furnished to said Norton, and to his colored followers and dupes, by and through Dr. —— Shields, the conservative superintendent of York County, and that a large amount of money was furnished and paid by the conservative State executive committee, its officers and agents, to be paid to said Norton, or to be expended under his advice and direction for the uses and purposes above set forth.

I now read from the answer of Mr. Goode:

I deny that money was paid and furnished to Robert Norton by the recognized committee-men, authorities, and exponents of the conservative party in Norfolk City, or by the conservative State executive committee, its officers or agents, to be expended under his advice and direction for the uses and purposes which you have set forth. If any of my friends contributed pecuniary aid to Norton in the progress of the campaign, it was done without any knowledge or suggestion on my part, upon their individual responsibility as citizens, for the legitimate purpose of creating division in the ranks of your party, and accomplishing your defeat by all fair and honorable means.

The following is the testimony of William F. Allen, city superintendent for the conservative party of Norfolk:

Question 19. To the best of your information, knowledge, and belief, did you or your political associates, or Norton and his political associates, or any sane man in this congressional district, believe for one moment, after Mr. Goode's nomination, that Robert Norton stood any chance whatever of being elected Representative in Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia?

Answer. I do not think so, to the best of my knowledge, information, and belief.

Q. 20. Do you not know and verily believe that said Norton campaign club was kept up and maintained for the sole purpose of promoting Mr. Goode's election?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 26. State to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief how much money was furnished to the Norton campaign club of Norfolk and to the officers and members thereof during the campaign by the conservative party in Norfolk City, including the official organizations and members of the party.

A. Between four and five hundred dollars.

* * * * * * * *

Q. 31. State to the best of your knowledge, information, and belief how much money was sent from Norfolk City by the conservative party and its members to the county of York or for the use of Robert Norton or the Norton party aforesaid, or the members thereof.

A. Nine hundred and fifty dollars. I know the amount, because I sent it myself; all sent by my direction.

Q. 32. Does the $950 include the one-hundred-dollar check referred to in Mr. Platt's notice of contest as having been sent by you; I mean your check?

A. It does.

Q. 33. Does it also include Mr. William M. Chaplain's check for $100 referred to in the notice of contest?

A. It does, to the best of my knowledge.

Q. 34. To whom or through whom did you send the moneys above referred to?

A. Dr. William H. Shields, of York County.

Q. 35. How much whisky or other liquors were sent from Norfolk City to York County by the like parties and to the like parties and for the like purposes as were the $950 aforesaid?

A. One barrel of whisky was sent by me.

* * * * * * * *

Q. 40. Were you in York County at any time during the campaign?

A. No, sir.

Q. 41. Did you, during the campaign, see and converse with Robert Norton on political subjects?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. 42. More than once? How often?

A. Twice.

Q. 43. Please state said conversations as well as you can remember them. State their substance, tenor, and effect.

A. The conversation was, he stated to me that he had already expended $800 or $1,000—all the money he had—and without some assistance he could not conduct the campaign—without some assistance. I then asked him how much money it would require. He stated $2,500. I told him there was no money in the treasury of the conservative party of Norfolk, but that I would furnish him with $1,000 during the campaign, should he require that amount. This was the substance of the first conversation. In the second conversation I wanted to know how he was getting along, and if he still thought that he could carry 1,500 votes for him on the peninsula. His answer was, "Yes, and as many more."

Mr. Speaker, it was upon these pleadings, this evidence, and these statements in the gentleman's brief that I propounded the query I made on Tuesday in reference to the code of morals. If I was understood as charging the gentleman with bribery, or as even being cognizant with these questionable practices, I desire to say that such was not my intention, and the record completely exonerates him. But if such a defense as is made in the answer of the gentleman and in his brief, if such means as legitimate, fair, and honorable is in accordance with any proper code of morals, I am mistaken and can only say that such was not the code under which I was raised.

In reference to my alleged assault upon the State officers of Virginia, which seems so to have excited the Representatives from that State and drawn upon my head such a fusilade of wit from all along the line, I can only say that I based my statements upon the record; that the record shows that in violation of all principles of law and justice they, on a mere technicality, threw out the returns of Prince George County and gave to Mr. Goode the certificate of election. In that regard I have not one word to alter or change, and I still insist that if these State officers had done their duty Mr. Goode would have been the contestant and not Mr. Platt.

I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. THOMPSON.]

Mr. THOMPSON. Mr. Speaker, the question that the House is called upon at this time to decide is whether in the second congressional district in the Commonwealth of Virginia James H. Platt, jr., received a plurality of the legal votes cast in that district November 3, 1874; or whether a plurality of the legal votes in that district were given for the sitting member, John Goode, jr. That is the simple question which is involved in this case, and we are to determine it not as the friends of the one party or the other, not as politicians, but we are to determine it as a judicial question. It is as much a judicial question as the one now being tried at the other end of the Capitol. And whoever attempts to bring into a decision of this question directly or indirectly anything in the nature of politics is attempting to do injustice to the one side or the other.

The object and purpose of us all should be to keep political considerations out of this question; to exclude them entirely. We are canvassing the votes of that district; we are acting upon our oaths as a court. We are not now upon the stump trying to persuade the people as we may sometimes do with poor facts and poorer logic, but we are trying here to ascertain the real facts in this case. I do not propose to be led in any manner to consider this as a party or a political question.

As for the sitting member, I certainly have regarded him and do regard him now as a man of decided ability, a man of real integrity of character, qualities which I feel in this matter must tell in favor of the man whether deservedly so or not. But I submit that no degree of elevation of character here ought to swerve us from our duty. As to Mr. Platt, I have not had the honor of his acquaintance except as he has appeared in this case. I take it for granted that he is an honorable and high-toned man. I know nothing to the contrary. Certainly that is the presumption here.

It is said when Mr. Choate was upon a certain occasion calling the attention of the supreme judicial court of Massachusetts, over which Chief Justice Shaw was presiding, one of the most impartial judges that ever presided in court, to the distinguished revolutionary services of his client, the chief justice rebukingly said, "Mr. Choate, what have the revolutionary services of your client to do with the merits of this case?" Said Mr. Choate, in that inimitable style of his, "I trust that a little will be pardoned to the ardor of counsel when he has so respectable a client." Chief Justice Shaw replied, "In this court all clients are respectable and all counsel ardent." Is not this the true position? Before an impartial court all parties stand equal.

And that is the way that these parties should stand here. Whatever may be our friendship for the one or the other, let it not influence our action. If any of us have a strong friendship for the one or the other of the parties in this case, let us be careful that it does not swerve us from the performance of our duty.

I hardly know, Mr. Speaker, what is the position of the minority of the committee in this case. They have said to the House "You may take everything if you will but give the sitting member the seat." That is the way they talk; they state this and that and the other, but you will see they always wind up with the proviso, "only let the sitting member have the seat."

Now, I wish to ask (as it may shorten the discussion) whether it is contended by the minority of the committee, or by the sitting member, that Bland and Rives Townships should be excluded. I pause for a reply.

Mr. GOODE. I do not see the chairman of the committee present. I would not now present myself before the House, but for the distinct interrogatory of my friend and the declaration that he "pauses for a reply." My reply is that according to our construction——

Mr. THOMPSON. I desire an answer to the question; yes or no.

Mr. GOODE. I say that according to the law we might insist upon the exclusion of Rives and Bland Townships; but for the purposes of this case we are willing to concede Rives and Bland.

Mr. THOMPSON. I thought so. I had respect enough for the gentleman's ability and judgment to feel that he would do so. That issue then is eliminated from the case. We have, then, Rives and Bland Townships counted in, as every member of this House looking at the case impartially would count them in. I thank the gentleman for saving me the trouble of arguing that point.

This, then, narrows down the question at issue in this case. The next question is with regard to the navy-yard districts, and I will say here that I was not a little surprised at the position taken by the sitting member in arguing this case with regard to the navy-yard districts. But I accounted for it from his seeing clearly his situation. I saw that he felt his position must be changed or he was lost. Changing it, I submit, does not save him, because now his position is too feeble to support him. What does he say? He says that at the navy-yard those three polls ought to be so purged as to reject from them 567 votes, while the committee have rejected the entire polls, which gained him 441 votes, a difference of 126 votes.

I wish to call attention briefly to the position taken by Mr. Goode, who was his own counsel upon this point at the hearing, and the position which is now taken. Will the Clerk do me the favor to read from the sitting member's answer to the notice of contest?

The Clerk read as follows:

Eleventh. I shall maintain and insist that the whole vote cast at the precincts in the third and fourth wards of the city of Portsmouth, and at Hall's Corner precinct, in the county of Norfolk, should be rejected as illegal and void and not counted, because the poll-books at the said precincts were not certified, signed, sealed, and returned as the law requires, and because the election at the said precincts was influenced by the most glaring fraud, bribery, corruption, and intimidation.

To receive and count votes taken under such circumstances of constraint and duress would be not only to affix a stigma upon the fair escutcheon of the State, but to inflict a serious blow upon the dearest rights of American citizens. It would be not only a mockery of the elective franchise, but a gross violation of all law, both State and Federal, which regulates the conduct of elections. I shall confidently claim that the entire vote cast at Hall's Corner precinct, in Norfolk County, and at the precincts in the third and fourth wards of the city of Portsmouth, at which precincts the said employés in the navy-yard generally voted, should be rejected by the House of Representatives as illegal, null, and void.

Mr. THOMPSON. I have had this read for the purpose of showing the ground assumed at the hearing, that those polls should be excluded. It was never intimated or thought of that it was possible to purge those polls. The committee would not for a moment have attempted to do anything of the kind. There were no facts from which they could do it because of the proof of improper interference at the navy-yard in the election, and because it was impossible to tell the extent and effect of that influence the polls could not be purged; they were excluded. I will now call attention to the brief of counsel and see whether upon the argument before the committee he took that ground.

Fourthly. We maintain that the whole vote cast at the precincts in the third and fourth wards of the city of Portsmouth and at Hall's Corner precinct in Norfolk County should be rejected as illegal and not counted, upon the grounds alleged in the eleventh specification of contestee's answer, which have been fully sustained by the testimony. It would be difficult to imagine a more glaring case of bribery, intimidation, and corruption. We are unwilling to believe that this committee or the House of Representatives will countenance or tolerate a system of influencing votes which destroys the freedom of the citizen and strikes at the very foundation of republican institutions. To receive and to count votes given under such circumstances would be not only a mockery, but a gross violation of all law, both State and Federal, which regulates the conduct of elections.

We have done just what he requested to have done. He asked to have those polls excluded, and we have excluded them. It was never claimed or intimated in any manner or form that these polls could be purged, and the sitting member is estopped from claiming it. The action of the committee may be subject to criticism for excluding the navy-yard precincts, but I believed it right when I signed the report and believe it right now. Certainly the sitting member did not claim that those polls could be purged; yet now he comes into the House and says that they can be purged, although there is no testimony upon which it can be done; it is impossible. He has no right to ask to have it done. Those polls must be rejected, and by that he gains in this canvass 441 votes. He is certainly entitled to nothing more.

I will not say that he undertook to "swap horses crossing the stream" in taking the position that he has taken here in this House, for there was but one horse and that with rider went down in the current; there was no other horse to take. He was simply a "drowning man catching at a straw;" but it was one of the smallest straws that any drowning man ever caught at.

Let us go just one step further. The chairman of our committee [Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia] has come in here this morning with a new discovery. He says that at least 13 votes must be excluded because two ballots were put in at the same time. I say this has not been put anywhere in the reports; it has not been heard of in this discussion till this morning; it is a new revelation. The committee unanimously said that those votes should be counted; there was no reason why they should not be. The gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BLACKBURN,] who is a clear-headed and sagacious man, who is not accustomed to yield too much, conceded this. He said let them be counted; and I submit that he could not do otherwise. Never was there a clearer proposition put; the whole committee were unanimous upon it; yet that is one of the straws which they are catching at. The argument is, "Give us the seat and you may have all the votes." But the seat must go with the votes.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. The gentleman says that the members of the committee were unanimous in regard to those 13 votes. I ask him whether his attention was ever called to them before, whether he discussed them in committee at all?

Mr. THOMPSON. Certainly; we discussed everything. This case has been carefully and laboriously considered; and after the fullest discussion and consideration the committee unanimously decided that those votes ought to be counted.

I think I have given a full and complete answer to that.

Now, sir, let us come down a step further and see where we are. We are getting now somewhere near "hard-pan" and where we can canvass and count. We have got down now to these illegal votes, be they more or be they less. Mr. Speaker, I concede that 100 illegal votes are claimed, and base my calculation in the report upon that number, but I have never conceded, never can concede on the facts, that 100 votes were proved to be illegal. But I put it upon that basis, giving every one that by any possibility can even be claimed to be illegal. Then I say upon any fair computation Mr. Platt was elected.

Let us see how it is. And I wish to say this: I have been grieved, I have been pained in this hearing to find this fact declared in the House, that in the Commonwealth of old Virginia the color line is the line which divides parties. I had been led before the opening of this case and the argument in this House to suppose a different state of things existed there. But, sir, it has been asserted here in this House by the distinguished sitting member, and by his friend [Mr. TUCKER] who so ably argued this case, at least so far as declamation and invective is concerned. It is also asserted in the position taken by the member from Kentucky [Mr. BLACKBURN] and by the chairman of our committee, that the color line divides parties in Virginia. I am sorry for it, but I take that as an established fact, as an admitted fact for the purpose of this hearing. Such is the state of things, however reluctantly I admit it. And I rest this case upon the fact that all the illegal white votes were cast for Goode, and the illegal colored votes were all cast for either Mr. Platt or Mr. Norton, the colored candidate. If my salvation rested upon the result I would risk it. Upon the color line I can show, taking those illegal votes, call them 100, call them 92, call them 90, call them whatever you think is right, from the highest to the lowest, and you cannot get any other fact from it than that Mr. Platt is elected. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is quite important to see the spirit with which this matter has been presented. When I speak of the spirit in which it has been presented, I do not mean it has been presented with malice or with hatred, but I mean this: that much has been done here by personal friendship, and there has been a disposition to give everything that possibly could be given in favor of the sitting member. I am frank to admit upon this floor in that matter I have had somewhat of the same disposition myself; but certainly I could not depart for friendship from the plain path of duty. But I will say in canvassing these votes here it is not a pleasant duty for me to perform. I performed it as a matter of religious duty, for if I did not do it I could never hold up my head in any community. If I should, after giving this matter the most careful consideration and arriving at the conclusion I have, let the contestant in any manner suffer in this hearing through my willful neglect, I am satisfied it would so lessen my own self-respect that I would be worth nothing to myself or the community in which I live.

Let us consider this a moment, to see the spirit with which these votes have been canvassed. I say again, I use that expression in no invidious or offensive sense. I fear my time will not permit me to go through, but I will hasten rapidly. Let me commence. The first is Nelson, York County, where there were cast 15 illegal votes, 2 white and 13 black. What does the sitting member say in regard to those votes? He is a man you would trust anywhere where self-interest has not a controlling power. The Apostle Paul has said, "When I would do good, evil is present with me," and I feel it is oftentimes the fact that many a good Christian can truthfully say, "When I would do good, self-interest is present with me, so that it is no more I that do it, but self-interest, that dwelleth in me."

He says, take those 13 colored votes from Platt. Why, Mr. Speaker, in the name of everything that is fair and just, should that be done? They have shown great affection for Mr. Norton. I do not propose to comment upon that. I will not step out of the record for any good opportunity. I say in that precinct Mr. Norton received 188 votes, Mr. Platt 160 votes, John Goode, jr., 49 votes; and now they say, although Mr. Norton was a colored man, all those 13 votes should be deducted from Mr. Platt, and those supporting his claims do not concede for one moment that one of these colored men voted for his own colored brother. If you divide them on the color line there, you will find they stand thus——

Mr. HOAR. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. THOMPSON. I am always pleased to hear the gentleman.

Mr. HOAR. I wish to inquire if the minority of the committee have not taken Mr. Norton's own vote away from himself and deducted it from Mr. Platt?

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. No, sir.

Mr. THOMPSON. Yes; they have done that; that is the effect of it and that is what I am talking about. And I say that putting those votes on the color line Mr. Platt would get only 6 of those votes and Mr. Norton 7.

"O," but they say, "these colored people thought so much of Platt that every one must be presumed to have voted for him." I ask is there any fairness in that? I think I need not appeal to the House on that proposition. I am amazed that any men of common fairness where their own interests are not at stake should have assumed such a proposition.

We thus get rid of 7 of those votes honestly and fairly, so far as Mr. Platt is concerned. Let me pass on to the next. I now call the attention of the House to the Stony Creek precinct. At that precinct twenty-six persons voted upon transfers registered upon the day of election. Now, I say this, that the law of Virginia is so complex and so uncertain that, bringing what little ability I have to the study of it, I have not been able to determine what it really does provide. I have consulted with the lawyers of that State and I find them not to have been more fortunate than myself. In my computation in the report I have put them all as claimed to be illegal, but I am satisfied that would not be fair to treat them all as illegal. I will take the ground taken by the sitting member and by the minority of the committee upon this point, and I will call them nineteen; two white and seventeen colored. That is all they ask. It is all they are entitled to. I cheerfully concede them those.

Then comes Jamestown; 1 white and 15 colored is what they claim. I concede them those.

But now we come to another precinct, and I ask the careful attention of the House to this. I refer to Guilford. If I am mistaken in the view I take of the evidence, I wish to be corrected. If I overstate the evidence in any manner, I wish to be corrected. I say the testimony with regard to Guilford is this. That on Saturday, the Saturday previous to the Tuesday on which the election was held, 20 voters were registered, and illegally registered; there is no question about that. The testimony is that they were mostly colored. The proof showed that on election day 8 of those men voted; 2 white and 6 colored. That is all the evidence there is upon that subject. There is no claim that there is any evidence that any more than these 8 voted. The minority of the committee and the sitting member and his distinguished and able friend from Virginia, [Mr. TUCKER,] say that you must assume because those other men were registered illegally on Saturday they therefore voted illegally on the following Tuesday. Did ever a lawyer submit any such proposition as that to a jury or a court? And that is the whole of it. I say there is not any presumption of that kind. Why, sir, the presumption is all the other way. I say that all that is proved is that there were 8 illegal votes; 2 white and 6 black. Let them be subtracted. Am I fair about that? I pause for a reply.

Mr. GOODE. I think not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts yield to the gentleman from Virginia?

Mr. THOMPSON. I do for a moment for an answer. I desire to be fair.

Mr. GOODE. I think the gentleman is not fair in that statement, although I believe he intends to be fair. The testimony in regard to the county of Surry proves this: that on the Saturday preceding the election twenty persons were illegally registered, and that on the Monday following, the day before the election, a large number of persons presented themselves and demanded registration; that they were refused by the registrar upon the ground that, having examined the law between Saturday and Monday, he had come to the conclusion that he had no right to register within the ten days before the election. Now, sir, he says he registered twenty, but for the life of him he cannot remember but eight, and he could not remember the eight until the registration-book was brought before him, and then by means of that he recollected those eight names. Still, however, he is positive in the recollection that at least twenty were registered; and I say that it is not fair to assume that only the eight voted, because the testimony shows that all the eight that could be remembered were known to have voted.

Mr. THOMPSON. Now I want to know if I could be more completely vindicated in every word I said. I know perfectly well this House will not believe I have intentionally misstated the facts. The gentleman himself says he does not believe I would be unfair; and he has corroborated every word I have said. He says that because twenty persons registered illegally on the Saturday previous to the election, therefore the whole twenty voted illegally on the Tuesday following.

Mr. GOODE rose.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman has made his statement, and I cannot yield to him further. I give him the benefit of his statement, and it corroborates mine. And I will not say that that shows a bad spirit, but I will say it shows the power of self-interest here in this matter. Why should you take off those 12 votes? I appeal to this House, is there any member here who will claim that those votes should not be counted? I do not pause for a reply, for I know the character of this House too well to believe that any member here will dispute the correctness of the position I have taken.

Now, sir, we come to another precinct. We come to Bruton. There 2 votes are proved to be illegal, but nothing is said about their color at all.

Mr. GOODE. They were not counted by me.

Mr. THOMPSON. The gentleman says they were not counted by him. I cannot see how they could be counted. But they were counted by the minority of the committee as both colored, when there was no proof whether they were colored or not.

That only shows how the contest was gotten up. The chairman of the committee tells you that the color line settles that. I hope I have made myself understood. I wish that it was so that the members of the House could take their pens and go over the list of those illegal votes with me, but if I make a mistake I know I shall be corrected. I will go over them very briefly and show you what the result really was, because outside of these illegal votes there is no question but that Mr. Platt would have 59 plurality and his opponent must overcome that 59 plurality. Here is a list of the white and colored votes cast. In Nelson, 2 white and 6 colored for Mr. Platt; in Sussex, 7 white and 6 colored; in Stony Creek, 2 white and 17 colored; in Jamestown, 1 white and 15 colored; in Guilford, 2 white and 6 colored; in Bruton, 1 white and 1 colored, and 7 scattering illegal votes in various precincts, all colored. That makes the illegal vote, independent of the 7 given for Norton, 73, and with Norton's vote 80, and here you see the difference between the computation of the minority of the committee and mine. They say there were 92 illegal votes; take off the 12 votes which they say were cast, which I do not admit were cast, it makes 80; so you see there is no discrepancy and no difference about the number; and as there were 15 white and 58 colored you will find that there were 43 more colored votes than there were whites, and then if you take the 43 from 59 that gives Platt 16 plurality on the color line. There is no man here who can make any figures that will shake that conclusion. Mr. Platt was elected by 16 votes if you take the color line. I accept it, and it does help in this case.

But there have been some questions of law raised in this case to which I beg briefly to call attention. The minority of the committee say that where you cannot eliminate the illegal votes you must throw out the whole precinct, but they have eliminated them here; they have done it by the color line. I am sorry that such a state of facts exists, but I am bound by the testimony. It eliminates the illegal votes and, after eliminating the illegal votes, makes it clear beyond all question that Mr. Platt had a plurality of 16 votes. There can be no mistake about that matter. There never was a question before any House plainer than this. I have gone over this case I think as much in detail as is necessary to a clear and full understanding of it. I feel that I ought in justification of the position I have taken here in regard to the counting of these votes to say that if a party claims 100 illegal votes cast against him he ought to prove the fact; that he is bound in law to prove not only that they were illegal votes, but, if possible, that they were not cast for him.

In this House in the Forty-second Congress, in the case of John Cessna vs. Benjamin F. Myers, from Pennsylvania, this question was very carefully considered, and the House will excuse me when I say that in that case it was a republican contestant against a democratic sitting member—a republican, too, of merit and having many friends—but this House then said that it could not waive or violate so important a principle as that, and a distinguished member from Massachusetts, the gentleman from the Worcester district, [Mr. HOAR,] made that report. It was a unanimous report, and took the ground that a party who alleges that illegal votes were cast must prove not only that they were cast, but, if possible, that they were not cast for him, and the democratic sitting member held his seat. That is the plainest and clearest proposition of law. I say that when a sitting member alleges affirmatively that illegal votes were cast he must prove that the illegal votes were cast for his opponent or that it is not possible to show for whom they were cast; and I say the sitting member in this case has not proven this by any testimony which appears before the committee. I have given the most liberal construction upon all the questions involved in this case in favor of Mr. Goode, and still it leaves a plurality of 16 for Mr. Platt.

Mr. Speaker, I feel earnestly upon this question. I have spoken with some degree of earnestness upon it and I do not wish the House to believe that I am not in earnest, for I feel that not only my character but the character of this House is at stake in the determination of this question. I shall feel sad indeed to have a mistake made in the decision of this case, to have a blot put upon this House in a matter in regard to which there has been so much of complaint—whether with or without cause, it is immaterial now to discuss. I trust that the cry of "carpet-bagger" is not going to prevent a party from having a fair and impartial hearing here. If it does, I ask may not some other cry on some future day be successfully raised to prevent a party from having a fair and impartial trial here? I commend this to the consideration of every member of this House on whichsoever side he may hold a seat. I say this deliberately, after the most mature reflection, that if the sitting member is allowed to hold his seat it will be one of the baldest outrages upon a contestant and upon the legal voters of a congressional district ever perpetrated in or out of this House, and I most earnestly urge this House to consider the importance of a fair and impartial verdict in this case. I ask that every vote shall be given upon the legal merits of the case, irrespective of party considerations or personal or political friendships.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will now read the resolutions reported by the majority of the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John Goode, jr., was not elected and is not entitled to a seat in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia.

Resolved, That James H. Platt, jr., was elected and is entitled to a seat in the Forty-fourth Congress as Representative from the second district of Virginia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The minority of the Committee of Elections offer as a substitute for those resolutions the resolution which the Clerk will now read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That John Goode, jr., was elected and is entitled to the seat which he now holds in the House of Representatives in the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of Virginia.

The question was upon agreeing to the substitute reported from the minority of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Upon that question, I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, John B. Clark, jr., of Missouri, Clymer, Cochrane, Cook, Cox, Davis, De Bolt, Dibrell, Durham, Eden, Faulkner, Felton, Finley, Forney, Franklin, Gibson, Glover, Gunter, Andrew H. Vance, Waldron, Charles C. B. Walker, Alexander S. Wallace, John W. Wallace, Walling, Warren, Erastus Wells, Wheeler, Whitehouse, Wigginton, Andrew Williams, Willis, Alan Wood, jr., Fernando Wood, and Yeates—81.

So the substitute was agreed to.

During the call of the roll the following announcements were made:

Mr. THOMPSON. I am paired with Mr. HUNTON, of Virginia. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. HOUSE. On this question I am paired with Mr. YEATES, of North Carolina. If present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. WALKER, of New York. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PLATT. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. DURAND. I am paired with Mr. HOSKINS, of New York. I do not know how he would vote if present, but I would vote "no."

Mr. KASSON. I can inform the gentleman that Mr. HOSKINS would vote "no."

Mr. EGBERT. I desire to say that I am paired with my colleague, Dr. WALLACE. Not knowing how he would vote if present, I decline to vote.

Mr. CASON. My colleague, Mr. FULLER, is absent; I do not know how he would vote if here. I am paired with him on all political questions, but as I do not regard this as a political question I have voted.

Mr. HARDENBERGH. My colleague, Mr. ROBERT HAMILTON, is detained from the House by sickness; and my colleague, Mr. TEESE, is absent on account of important business.

Mr. NORTON. I am paired with Mr. JENKS, of Pennsylvania; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. WILLIS; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. BURLEIGH. On this question I am paired with Mr. CULBERSON, of Texas; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. BANKS. When I was appointed yesterday as one of the committee to accompany the remains of Hon. A. T. Caperton, late Senator from West Virginia, I expected to be absent to-day, and Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky, was kind enough to pair with me. I have not been able to notify Mr. KNOTT this morning that I am here, and therefore I decline to vote.

A short time subsequently

Mr. BANKS said: I observe that Mr. KNOTT, of Kentucky, with whom I was paired, is now present. As I have no doubt he would like to vote, I will myself vote.

Mr. SAMPSON. I am paired with Mr. DOUGLAS, of Virginia, who if present would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. ROBINSON. I am paired with Mr. CANDLER, of Georgia, who if present would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. WHITING. My colleague, Mr. FORT, is absent by order of the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I am paired with Mr. HEREFORD, of West Virginia; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. WIGGINTON. I am paired on all political questions with Mr. WALLACE, of South Carolina. As his friends claim that this is a political question, I will not vote. If present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. MACKEY. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ALAN WOOD, jr.; if present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. DARRALL. I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ELLIS; if present he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I am paired with Mr. FORT, of Illinois.

Mr. KEHR. My colleague, Mr. WELLS, of Missouri, is unavoidably absent from the House.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] on leaving the city left his pair with me. I know that he would have voted "no" on this question; and I therefore release the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DURAND] from the pair, as he votes the same way.

Several MEMBERS. O, no!

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a personal question with the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HALE. Certainly, that leaves the matter open for the gentleman to act as he may deem proper.

Mr. DURAND. If I am released from my pair with Mr. HOSKINS, I am ready and willing to vote.

A MEMBER. Who can release you?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Order, gentlemen! This is simply a personal understanding between two gentlemen.

Mr. GARFIELD. A pair between two gentlemen on the same side is not a pair and never was.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This debate is not in order. Does the gentleman from Michigan desire to vote?

Mr. DURAND. I do. I vote "no."

Mr. BURCHARD, of Wisconsin. I desire to state that the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOSKINS] engaged me to pair with him upon this question. Afterward I asked to be relieved from that arrangement upon condition that Mr. HOSKINS should pair with Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, who is not here. I will state that I went personally with Mr. HOSKINS to Mr. VANCE when the arrangement of the pair was made, and that Mr. HOSKINS requested me to announce that he had paired upon this question with Mr. VANCE and desired so to be placed upon the record.

Mr. CONGER. That is all right.

Mr. HALE. I had that impression.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question then recurred upon agreeing to the report of the committee as amended by the adoption of the substitute.

Mr. CONGER. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, Banning, Beebe, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Samuel D. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Caulfield, John B. So the report of the committee, as amended, was adopted.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. THOMPSON. I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. HUNTON. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. COCHRANE. I desire to announce that my colleagues, Mr. ROSS and Mr. STENGER, are absent by leave of the House.

Mr. WALKER, of New York. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. PLATT. If present he would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. JOHN REILLY. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. FORT who if present would vote "no," while I should vote "ay."

Mr. CASON. I desire to make the same announcement as on the last vote.

Mr. DARRALL. On this question I am paired with my colleague, Mr. ELLIS. If present he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. LEAVENWORTH. I am paired on this question with my colleague, Mr. WILLIS. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. NORTON. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. JENKS. If present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. SAMPSON. On this question I am paired with the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. DOUGLAS, who if present would vote in the affirmative, while I should vote in the negative.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I am paired on this question with the gentleman from West Virginia, Mr. HEREFORD. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. ROBINSON. I desire to announce that I am paired with the gentleman from Georgia, Mr. CANDLER, who if here would vote "ay," while I should vote "no."

Mr. BURLEIGH. Upon this question I am paired with the gentleman from Texas, Mr. CULBERSON. If he were present he would vote "ay," and I should vote "no."

Mr. WIGGINTON. I am paired with the gentleman from South Carolina, Mr. WALLACE, who if present would vote "no," and I should vote "ay."

Mr. HOUSE. I desire to state that on this question I am paired with the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. YEATES. If present he would vote in the affirmative, and I should vote in the negative.

Mr. FOSTER. Some two weeks ago when my colleague, Mr. WALLING, left the city, I agreed to pair with him on political and financial questions. Not considering this a political question, and of course not a financial one, I voted on the previous roll-call, and I now vote "no."

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. BLACKBURN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate, pursuant to Rule 25 for impeachments, had taken order that the Senate will resume the consideration of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap at twelve o'clock noon on Monday next.

The message further announced that Mr. KERNAN, of New York, had been appointed in place of Mr. CAPERTON, of West Virginia, deceased, one of the managers on the part of the Senate in the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the following bill:

A bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 2161) for the relief of R. H. Buckner; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3927) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to investigate Chinese Immigration.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House was requested, a bill of the following title:

A bill (H. R. No. 36) to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed and requested the concurrence of the House in a bill of the following title:

A bill (S. No. 904) for the relief of William C. Nichols, late assistant treasurer of the United States at Chicago, Illinois.

A MEMBER SWORN IN.

Mr. POPPLETON. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that Hon. Josiah G. Abbott, who was declared elected from the fourth congressional district of Massachusetts in the contest of Abbott vs. Frost, be now sworn in.

Mr. ABBOTT presented himself at the Clerk's desk, and was duly qualified.

NELSON TIFFANY.

Mr. BANNING. I rise to a privileged question and call up for consideration at this time a message of the President of the United States assigning reasons for withholding his approval of the bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I do not wish to lose my privilege of the floor to-day on the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will not lose his position. The matter referred to by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BANNING] is a question of privilege under the Constitution.

Mr. BANNING. I ask that the papers in the case be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying report of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to return herewith without my approval House bill No. 1337, entitled "An act for the relief of Nelson Tiffany."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 11, 1876.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, June 7, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to return House bill No. 1337, "for the relief of Nelson Tiffany."

The Adjutant-General, to whom the bill was referred, reports as follows:

"Nelson Tiffany, private Company A, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, deserted October 10, 1864, and remained absent until April 25, 1865, when he surrendered under the President's proclamation, thereby acknowledging his desertion.

"If this bill becomes a law it will not only falsify the records of this Department, but will be an injustice to every man who served honorably during the war of the rebellion."

I inclose the report (No. 402) of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in the case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

To the PRESIDENT.

[H. R. No. 1337. Forty-fourth Congress, first session.]

In the Senate of the United States May 1, 1876.—Read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

An act for the relief of Nelson Tiffany.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of War is hereby authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from Nelson Tiffany, late a private in Company H, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, and grant said Tiffany an honorable discharge.

Passed the House of Representatives April 29, 1876.

Attest:

GEORGE M. ADAMS, Clerk.

[Senate Report No. 402. Forty-fourth Congress, first session.]

JUNE 20, 1876.—Ordered to be printed.

Mr. CLAYTON submitted the following report to accompany bill H. R. 1337.

The Committee on Military Affairs, having under consideration the bill (H. R. No. 1337) for the relief of Nelson Tiffany, submit the following report:

We find that Nelson Tiffany was enlisted in Company A, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, on the 16th September, 1861, and was honorably discharged on May 15, 1865. He was severely wounded on May 9, 1864, and was sent to hospital at Bermuda Hundreds, from thence to Fortress Monroe, and finally to hospital at New Haven, Connecticut, from which place he received a furlough from June 17 for thirty days, which was extended to August 7, 1864, and at its expiration he reported to medical director at Boston, and by him sent to Readville, Massachusetts, on 10th October, being directed to report back to New Haven, Connecticut. He being in a worn-out and broken-down condition from wounds and sickness, believed he would never recover. He returned to his home at Auburn, Massachusetts, and then reported to the provost-marshal at Worcester, Massachusetts, and was by him sent to Fort Independence, and there remained until his discharge on May 15, 1865. The records show that Tiffany was a faithful soldier, and he is believed now to be upon his death-bed from wounds received in the war. The committee believe, from all the evidence in the case, that Nelson Tiffany never intended to desert, and they recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, this bill gives to Nelson Tiffany, a soldier of the Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, who was wounded May 9, 1864, and sent to hospital, where he remained until the close of the war, an honorable discharge.

The evidence in this case shows Nelson Tiffany was wounded and afterward honorably discharged from the hospital; that he has never recovered from his wound, and that he is now on his death bed by reason of said wound.

The records of the War Department show him to be a deserter. That this record is not true has been established to the satisfaction of the Military Committee of this House and of the Senate.

I ask that the bill be passed over the veto of the President.

The reasons for this are fully set out in the report read by the Clerk. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] who introduced the bill for Tiffany, has some evidences in addition to those presented to the committee. I yield to him to present them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now before the House is, Will the House, on reconsideration, agree to pass the bill?

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will make a statement in this case.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, this matter can be explained to the House in a few minutes, and as the Constitution requires this to be voted on by yeas and nays, perhaps the House will be willing to give me its attention for two or three minutes while I state the whole case.

This man Nelson Tiffany belongs to a highly respectable farmer's family in one of our most respectable towns. I am well acquainted with him and with his neighbors and friends. He enlisted in the war, served three years, and was one of the best soldiers in his regiment. He re-enlisted as a veteran. At Bermuda Hundreds he was shot through the abdomen, the ball striking the spine and making a fracture of the spinal column. The result of that wound is, the man has ever since been a perfect wreck, unfitted not only for military duty but labor of any kind. His life is a burden to him. When the wound is suppurating portions of bone come out, and while that is going on he is in a condition of great agony, thinking he is going to die. When the abscess breaks he gets relief from pain, but is an uncomfortable object to himself and friends while this loathsome discharge is coming from him.

In that condition, sir, he was sent to a hospital in Readville, Massachusetts, but got a furlough, and was directed to report to a hospital in Connecticut. He made his way home, a broken-hearted, broken-down wreck of a man, and did not go back at the time he was ordered to the New Haven hospital. It was a mere case of absence without leave. There was no military duty involved in it at all. As soon as he got better, he reported himself to the provost-marshal at Worcester, Massachusetts, three or four miles from his home, and he was then reported at Fort Independence, at Boston, under the President's proclamation.

And these facts, as I am informed by the Adjutant-General, were entirely unknown to him at the time he made the report to the President. He did not call for the documents in possession of the committee. If he had known them then, he said he would have removed the charge of desertion himself from the record of this soldier.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen this man myself. His comrades, who belong to one of the best companies of our own young yeomanry, one of the best regiments, the Twenty-fifth Massachusetts, which my honorable colleague [Mr. BANKS] knows by reputation; his comrades interest themselves very much in having the charge of desertion removed from this man.

I have here a letter from General Pickett, who was the lieutenant-colonel and colonel of that regiment and was afterward general; one of the best officers that went into the war. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST-OFFICE, WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS,
July 24, 1876.

MY DEAR SIR: I saw Dr. Rice Saturday in relation to Tiffany. He informs me this morning that he has made the required statement and sent it to you.

I shall be glad to do anything in my power to assist in restoring Tiffany to his rightful place on the rolls of the Army. The charge of desertion is clearly wrong. He was one of the best men in that whole regiment, and would never be guilty of a dishonorable act. I hope your efforts in his behalf may yet prove successful.

Very truly yours,

J. PICKETT.

Hon. GEO. F. HOAR.

Mr. HOAR. The House will perceive that General Pickett, colonel of the regiment, says in that letter this man was one of the best soldiers in his regiment and utterly incapable of being guilty of a dishonorable act. I now send to the desk to be read a letter from the surgeon of the regiment, who has also been in attendance on the man since the war, who is an eminent surgeon in my State, and for whose character I will personally vouch.

The Clerk read as follows:

It is hereby certified that Nelson Tiffany, of Auburn, Massachusetts, was formerly a private in Company A, Twenty-fifth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteers, in the service of the United States, and that while in said service and in the line of his duty as a soldier in an engagement near Bermuda Hundreds, Virginia, on the 9th day of May, 1864, he received a gun-shot wound of abdominal region of body, the ball fracturing the spinal column and passing nearly through the abdomen. He was sent to general hospital, and afterward, as I am informed, reported as a deserter; but from the severity of the wound it is my opinion that he was entirely incapacitated for duty as a soldier.

Since the close of the war I have attended him in a professional capacity from time to time, and I further certify that he has not recovered from the injury above described; that pieces of bone and pus are frequently discharged from the track of the wound; that he suffers much pain and distress, and that his constitution is seriously affected, so that he is unable to perform much manual labor in consequence of the injuries thus received.

Dated at Worcester, Massachusetts, July 22, 1876.

J. MARCUS RICE, M. D.,
Late Surgeon Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, Medical Inspector, Army of the James, &c.

WORCESTER, MASSACHUSETTS, July 22, 1876.

Subscribed and sworn to by said J. Marcus Rice before me.

[SEAL.] T. S. JOHNSON,
Clerk of Central District Court of Worcester.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. Speaker, the House will perceive that this unanimous report of the Military Committee is based on facts and that it is a case where this man who has become a poor wreck, who has given everything that made life comfortable or valuable to him to his country, simply failed to report at the hospital. It is no case of desertion. Let me suggest one thing further. It seems to me that as this has gone upon the records of the House, common justice to the man requires that the bill shall be passed.

Mr. BANKS. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. HOAR. Yes, sir.

Mr. BANKS. There is no reason why this bill should not be passed. On the contrary, every consideration of justice requires that the message of the President and his veto should be overruled. But inasmuch as the House is called upon to overrule the message of the President, and will probably do so by a unanimous vote, it ought to be stated that the report of the Adjutant-General is founded upon the record as it exists now. The Adjutant-General is certainly an honorable man and an honorable soldier, and would not willingly do injustice to any person. And on the statement of the facts to him after this matter was before the House some days since, the Adjutant-General said, in the presence of the Secretary of War, and with his concurrence, that on the presentation of the fact which my colleague has now stated to the House they would be willing to withdraw the report on which the message of the President is based.

Mr. HOAR. I am obliged to my colleague for the statement he has just made. Something of that kind had been stated to me, but I did not know that it occurred in the presence of the Secretary of War.

Mr. BANKS. Both gentlemen assured me they would be perfectly willing on the presentation of the facts to withdraw the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House on reconsideration pass this bill, notwithstanding the veto of the President? And under the Constitution this question must be necessarily determined by yeas and nays.

Mr. CONGER. On the statement made here by both the gentlemen from Massachusetts, I suggest the propriety of withholding action upon this matter until the President's message may be withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. We cannot do that.

Mr. CONGER. I feel a delicacy in voting upon this, whatever my opinion may be upon the merits. I feel a delicacy in voting upon it while the record stands as good.

Mr. HOAR. There is no constitutional power, in my judgment, to have that message withdrawn. The Constitution provides emphatically and explicitly that whenever the President has returned to the House where it originated a bill with his objections, that bill shall be submitted to the House again and voted upon by yeas and nays. And there is no such thing known to the practice of our Government as withdrawing such a message so far as I am aware. Even in that event it would still be on the Journals of the House.

Mr. CONGER. Suppose an official message is sent here stating that from information subsequently received the veto message is withdrawn. Then there is no conflict between the House and the Executive.

Mr. HOAR. It seems to me that over the sick-bed of this man, in these last three days of the session, my friend from Michigan on reflection will not desire to raise the technical question. It is very doubtful whether we can again get the attention of the House to this subject.

Mr. CONGER. But we are asked to go outside of the record before the House and to take testimony from other quarters.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan may move to postpone this if he desires.

Mr. HOAR. In reply to the observation just made by the gentleman from Michigan let me say that the Military Committee of the House and the Military Committee of the Senate found these facts which I have stated proved by legal evidence, and set them forth in detail in their report. The House is not passing this upon my statement.

Mr. BANNING. That report has been read and goes into the RECORD.

Mr. HOAR. And I procured this testimony from General Pickett, a distinguished soldier and colonel of the regiment, and from the surgeon, so that the House might see this was not the case of a deserter, but a case where the officers of the regiment themselves certify to the high character of the soldier. General Pickett says he was one of the best soldiers in the regiment.

Mr. CONGER. I would willingly join with the gentleman from Massachusetts or any other in removing any improper charge of desertion. It is not on that account that I suggest any delay, but because of the position in which the House and the Executive are placed in regard to testimony outside of the records cited in the President's message which are not denied to be correct.

Mr. HOAR. The House stands on the evidence before its Military Committee. The committees of the House are its eyes and ears, and the eyes and ears of the House are guided by legal evidence.

The Adjutant-General did not know that. All he knew was the imperfect history of the occurrence and the records of the Department. Now there is no disrespect to the Adjutant-General or his records in passing this bill over the veto of the President.

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman will allow me to suggest that all these cases that come here for the removal of charges of desertion have to come upon evidence outside of the record.

Mr. GARFIELD. Or else they would not have to come here at all.

Mr. BANNING. Yes, or else they would not have to come here at all. The evidence in this case is conclusive; it has been found sufficient by two committees.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman will allow me to say it has been found sufficient by four committees. The Committee on Military Affairs of the last House unanimously reported these facts, and the Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate also unanimously reported them, but the case was put upon the Calendar in the Senate and was not reached before the close of the session. There has now been a re-examination by both committees and both committees favor the passage of this bill.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to say one word. There is no reflection on the President in overruling his veto. Some gentlemen seem to think that there is some reflection on the President's honor or discretion in overruling his veto. Nothing of the kind. We have the statement of the gentleman from Massachusetts that the Department acted upon insufficient knowledge; but additional light has since been thrown upon the case, making it perfectly clear, and if they had had the information we now have at the time, they would not have entered the charge of desertion against this man. But, sir, there is only one constitutional way in which we can correct the error, and that is to pass this bill over the veto of the President.

Mr. BANNING. I am sure my friend will bear me out in saying that it was impossible that all the records should be correct.

Mr. GARFIELD. Doubtless the record was correct, but it came from the regiment in the field.

Mr. BANNING. In the discharge of a great army it was impossible that all the records should be correct.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is, Will the House, on reconsideration, pass the bill; and under the Constitution that question must be taken by yeas and nays.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 177, nay 1, not voting 107; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, Bagby, George A. Bagley, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Ballou, Banks, Banning, Bell, Blackburn, Blair, Bland, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, John Young Brown, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. So (two-thirds voting in favor thereof) the bill was passed.

CHARGES AGAINST HON. WILLIAM J. PURMAN.

Mr. DE BOLT. I rise to make a privileged report from the Committee on Civil Service in relation to the charge of a sale of a cadetship, &c., against Mr. PURMAN.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Has the committee a right to report at any time?

Mr. DE BOLT. No, sir; but it is a privileged report, as it relates to a member of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair recognizes that it is personal to a member of the House, but it does not affect his right to his seat. The Chair would willingly give the floor to the gentleman to call up the report at this time, which the Chair understands is a unanimous report.

Mr. CONGER. I reserve the right to object until the report is read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has a right to do that. The Clerk read as follows:

FORTY-FOURTH CONGRESS, FIRST SESSION,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
March 8, 1876.

"On motion of Mr. HOAR, of Massachusetts,

"Resolved, That the charge contained in the following extract, to wit—

"'ANOTHER MONEY-MAKING CONGRESSMAN.

"'Under this head the New York Sun prints the following telegram from this city:

"'"WILLIAM J. PURMAN, a republican Congressman from Florida—so several witnesses have testified before the Naval Committee—has been increasing his worldly possessions by the sale of a naval cadetship and also some of the Federal offices in Florida; also that he has received bribes for appointments, and has made his congressional position pay very well. Governor Stearns, of Florida, and Martin, the keeper of the State penitentiary, were the witnesses.'"—

"be referred to the Committee on the Civil Service Reform, with authority to investigate the same and to send for persons and papers.

"That the said committee further investigate the connection of said PURMAN with the appointment of timber agents in the State of Florida."

The committee having under consideration the foregoing resolution, find from the evidence that Mr. PURMAN made a proposition to Dr. Simpkins that if he (Simpkins) would contribute $300 to the "Witherspoon electioneering fund," he (PURMAN) would appoint Simpkins's boy to the Naval Academy. Simpkins refused to pay until his boy secured the appointment. PURMAN said, "He must have the money down," and thus the matter ended. There was no money paid, neither was the appointment made.

Your committee further find that no bribes were received by Mr. PURMAN for appointments, and that the evidence wholly fails to establish the sale of Federal offices.

The committee find that Mr. PURMAN did recommend persons for appointment as timber agents in the State of Florida; and that those agents never performed any service under their appointments, [except to draw their pay;] that in some instances Mr. PURMAN notified them beforehand that they would have nothing to do; that the persons so recommended and appointed were all colored, and resided from fifty to one hundred and fifty miles from the timber reservations; that they nor any of them, as far as the evidence shows, ever visited said reservations, nor even knew the location thereof; that the offices are mere sinecures, and that the appointments were made for political effect and purposes only.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. DE BOLT. As I do not see Mr. PURMAN in his seat, I will not ask the House to take action upon this report at the present time.

Mr. CONGER. I think the committee should make some recommendation to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman reserved the right to object until the report was read.

Mr. CONGER. I do not object to the report being received.

Mr. DE BOLT. I move that the report be printed and recommitted to the Committee on Civil Service Reform.

Mr. CONGER. Not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That will be the understanding.

The motion to print and recommit was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAMPSON. I now rise for the purpose of calling up the motion to reconsider the vote by which House bill No. 3370 to amend the statutes in relation to damages for infringement of patents, and for other purposes, was ordered to be engrossed.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I raise the question of consideration on that motion. Under the order of the House, made day before yesterday, to-day was assigned for the consideration of the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs in relation to the management of the Navy Department.

Mr. BRIGHT. I raise the question of consideration for another purpose, to move to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, this being objection day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There has been no morning hour to-day, and the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] cannot be interposed at this time against one of higher privilege. The first question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON.]

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to raise the question of consideration for the purpose of submitting a report from a committee of conference.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is a question of high privilege.

Mr. BRIGHT. I would move to postpone the morning hour with a view to go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The first question is upon the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. SAMPSON.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SPRINGER. My point of order is that this being private bill day, it is not in order to call up a motion to reconsider a vote upon a bill for a general purpose.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That point of order is well taken, but it was not the duty of the Chair to raise the point, although he was aware of it. This being Friday and private bill day, a motion to reconsider a vote on a public bill cannot be called up if objection is made, except after private business has been postponed by a majority vote.

Mr. SAMPSON. I raise the point whether the objection did not come too late.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Then I insist on the regular order: the consideration of the resolution reported by the majority of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which resolution (dispensing with the reading of the report) I desire to bring before the House.

Mr. HURLBUT. This being Friday, I call for the regular order—the morning hour of Friday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can raise the question of consideration upon the report of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. WHITTHORNE;] but the regular order is that report; it was made so under an order adopted by unanimous consent.

Mr. BRIGHT. Is not my motion in order to postpone the morning hour that the House may go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Not until the special order is disposed of Mr. WHITTHORNE. I insist upon the regular order.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration on that in order that we may go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, this being "objection day."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question of consideration being raised, the question is, Will the House now consider the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was made the special order for this day?

The question was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I yield to the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] my colleague on the committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose that the time agreed upon for discussion upon this report begins now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes, sir; the six hours will begin now; and whatever time may be yielded by the gentleman from Tennessee or any other gentleman will come out of the time fixed by the unanimous order of the House.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. One other point: This order having been made under a suspension of the rules, will it not deprive the chairman of the committee of the hour which he would otherwise have after the previous question is called?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would so hold. If any gentleman connected with the reports desires to call the previous question and have an hour thereafter, the previous question must be called at the termination of the fifth hour.

Mr. HALE. That was the understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was the understanding made by the unanimous order of the House; it cannot be modified except by unanimous action.

Mr. HALE. On the intimation of the Chair that the time which the gentleman from Tennessee may yield will be taken from the six hours——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It certainly will be.

Mr. HALE. I hope that the time will be taken from gentlemen on his side, because we do not want our time circumscribed.

Mr. LEWIS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. PHILIPS] to make a report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that this interminable yielding cannot be tolerated. Under the rules it is the duty of the Speaker to determine who shall have the floor and who shall not; and the Chair cannot permit the floor to be assigned otherwise.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit that a conference report is a privileged question, and does not come out of anybody's time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is unquestionably true. The Chair did not understand the gentleman as yielding for a conference report. The Chair is at all times ready to recognize gentlemen for the presentation of such reports.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 810) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 10, 11, 18, and 22.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, 21, 23, and 24.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 8, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out on page 1 of the bill lines 15 and 16; and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 9, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows:

Strike out of said amendment the word "fourteen" and insert in lieu thereof the word "eleven," and strike out "eight hundred and eighty," and at the end of the amendment add as follows: "which shall be in full for the pay of said band and for all company musicians for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, any law to the contrary notwithstanding;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 12 and 13, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: Strike out from each of said amendments the word "five" and insert in each in lieu thereof the word "two;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its amendment numbered 20, with an amendment striking out on page 5 lines 11 and 12 of the bill; and the House agree to the same.

SAMUEL J. RANDALL,
ERASTUS WELLS,
EUGENE HALE,
Managers on the part of the House.

W. B. ALLISON,
JOHN A. LOGAN,
WILLIAM A. WALLACE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the amount of the original estimates from the Department for the support of this West Point Military Academy was $437,470; the appropriation made last year, $364,740; and the recommendation of the Committee on Appropriations of this House for this year was $231,241. The bill as passed by the House appropriated $259,231, and as it passed the Senate $308,841. It now comes from the conference committee appropriating $290,065. The differences in the aggregate between the two Houses was $49,610. The House has receded as to $30,834 and the Senate as to $18,776.

The points of legislative difference between the two Houses related to the longevity pay of the professors who did not hold regular commissions in the Army of the United States, but commissions merely as professors, and to the additional pay to the regular Army officers assigned to that institution, and further as to the band at West Point. As to the two first points, the House conferees were confronted with the Army appropriation bill passed at this session, which in the fourth section provides that the whole subject-matter of reform and re-organization of the Army of the United States shall be referred to the commission hereinafter provided for, who shall carefully and thoroughly examine into the matter with reference to the demands of the public service, as to the number and pay of men and officers and the proportion of the several arms, and also as to the rank, pay, and duties of the several staff corps, and whether any and what reductions can be made either in the line or staff, in numbers or in pay, by consolidation or otherwise, consistently with the public service, having in view a just and reasonable economy in the expenditure of public money, the actual necessities of the military service, and the capacity for rapid and effective increase in time of actual war.

That portion of the Army appropriation bill to the minds of the conferees clearly covered the West Point Military Academy, and made it necessary therefore that that part of the organization of the Army should be referred to the same commission, to be regulated by their recommendations in the future, if such report should be adopted by both Houses of Congress and approved by the President in the form of law.

I believe that is all I need say, unless some gentleman desires to make further inquiry in reference to the matter.

The report was adopted.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the conference committee was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announcing their concurrence in the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 982) providing for the completion of the Washington Monument.

It further announced the passage, without amendment, of the bill (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of Jonathan White.

NAVAL INVESTIGATION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House now resumes the consideration of the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs, on which the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. Speaker, the conservative majority of the present Congress was in its election the result of the earnest attention which had been aroused on the part of the people to the misrule which had existed in the past and which had in so many ways blighted the hopes and prosperity of every section of our country. Such being our origin, the duty of reforming the administration of every branch of the Government became imperative, and we would be unworthy of the great trust which had been confided to us if we had shrunk from these investigations. It is true that many outside issues were attempted to be raised upon the other side of the House to "frighten us from our propriety" or to deter us from the performance of our duty; but the false, bitter, senseless cry that this was an "ex-confederate House" has had no terrors for us; and if it has affected the masses of the northern people I have much mistaken their temper, resolution, and patriotic devotion to the true principles of democratic government.

At an early date in this session various committees were charged with the duty of inquiring into the abuses, errors, or frauds that might exist in the different branches of the public service. Speaking for one of these I can say that, looking neither to the right nor to the left, regardless of consequences, they have gone forward with an examination, comprehensive, minute, and impartial, and have presented to Congress a report on the naval affairs of the Government that equals any ever submitted in time of peace to any Congress in labor, care, and research. The difficulties which surrounded them were so numerous and stupendous as not only to discourage but even to appall them. The present Secretary of the Navy, being fortified with seven years of experience in his office, with a patronage of $2,000,000 annually, with thousands of followers, many of whom were dependent on his will or caprice for their bread, determined to resist such an investigation as would lay bare the abuses, errors, violations of law and frauds which are given to the public in the majority report which is now pending before the House.

It is not practicable in a speech to present in detail the result of this investigation, and it is my purpose only to refer to those matters for which the Secretary himself is, in contemplation of law and of reason, justly responsible. The people of the United States, being masters of the western hemisphere and in close social and business intercourse with the civilized nations of the Old World, are greatly dependent on their commerce for their happiness and wealth, and have from their earliest history taken the greatest pride and interest in the Navy, which is the sole protector of this commerce as well as of their good name abroad. This Navy in its personnel and materiel was in war and in peace equal to their expectations, until within the last decade it has been brought by mismanagement to its present state of disorganization and inefficiency. There is nothing connected with Government and its powers to protect the people from foreign foes that is so important as keeping the Navy in a proper condition of training as to its men and of efficiency as to its materiel. Ships of war must in their force of momentum and power of resistance be equal to those of other nations or they become mere slaughter-pens for those who are compelled to man them. Sailors must be well kept and trained to handle the largest guns which can constitute a ship's armament.

It is a French maxim full of wisdom, "At sea nothing can be extemporized." The country through its highest interests demands the safeguard of a sufficient navy. It is a gross injustice to our brave officers and men, ready to risk their lives in her defense, that nothing is now in such a state of preparation or efficiency as to enable them if war should come to keep the sea or attack the enemy.

The testimony submitted to this House by the Committee on Naval Affairs demonstrates that the Bureau of Construction and Repair and the Secretary of the Navy are either ignorant of the speed, power, and tonnage of the best English, French, Spanish, and German men-of-war or they have attempted in their reports to mislead and impose upon Congress and the people of the United States. While our forts, rams, and monitors are perhaps sufficient for our coast defenses, guarding important cities, yet are our ships upon the seas so far behind the more modern improved vessels, that in the opinion of our best naval officers the largest squadrons that we can command could be annihilated by the enemy without his getting within the range of our guns. To charge that this condition of affairs is due to any defect in our system of Government is to deny our own history, ignore the gallant achievements of our seamen, and confess our experiment of free government a failure.

Nor can it be claimed that the present deplorable condition of the Navy is attributable to the lack of requisite power in that Department or the want of adequate appropriations for its maintenance. It is shown by the majority report that during the last seven years the expenditure for the Navy has exceeded the vast sum of $160,000,000, which is more than was appropriated during the fourteen years preceding the late war. Not only did the Forty-second Congress give the present Secretary power and means to build anew eight vessels of war, but in addition to this he has claimed and constantly exercised the extraordinary power of building ships entirely new by virtue of his permission under the law to repair old ones. With our immense resources and facilities, extensive basins, docks, yards, and vast factories, able officers and skilled workmen, all that has been needed during the last seven years was an able, faithful, honest head as Secretary of the Navy who could properly estimate his duties and responsibilities, respect the laws he is sworn to support, and draw to his assistance the wisest and best men in the service.

To every person familiar with the operations of our Government it is apparent that there is no position, save one, more important or exalted than the office of Secretary of the Navy. He is not merely a Cabinet officer, a member of the President's council, but he is the responsible head of the most important branch of the executive department.

The law makes him directly responsible for the proper expenditure of all appropriations, general, special, and contingent, for the naval service.

No officer of the Government has the immediate charge of so much public property, consisting of ships, monitors, docks, yards, stations, machinery, ordnance, clothing, provisions, &c. The well-being of sailors, the reputation of officers, the fidelity and honesty of contractors, the faithful disbursement of millions of money, the defense of our commerce and national honor, are to a great extent dependent upon him. Ours is a Government of law. Its majesty must be supreme. A profound reverence for it upon the part of those who should execute and those who should obey it is the only safeguard of our liberties and the only protection to our lives and property. Break down this sentiment, then will virtue and justice, fidelity and patriotism, be overwhelmed beneath the tide of license, misrule, corruption, and fraud; and treachery, lust, and vulgarity will usurp the high places of state.

The proof before this House shows that the present Secretary of the Navy has failed to appreciate the grave duties and responsibilities of his exalted position. He has used his office for personal and partisan objects, and in his zeal for these he has neglected its plainest requirements. He has openly and repeatedly violated the laws, and so far from attempting to punish offenders he has connived at their offenses and in many instances retained them in office. He has imposed upon Congress, he has betrayed his trust, he has demoralized the service, he has perverted his patronage, and has given to his country an administration of the Navy that is wasteful, extravagant, and full of abuses, with many millions of money unaccounted for and many millions more squandered in wanton and useless ways.

Descending now to such details as my limited time will allow me to discuss, I will first call the attention of the House to certain plain statutes which the head of the Navy has openly violated. I read sections 3676 and 3678 of the Revised Statutes:

SEC. 3676. All appropriations for specific, general, and contingent expenses of the Navy Department shall be under the control and expended by the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, and the appropriations for such Bureau shall be kept separate in the Treasury.

SEC. 3678. All sums appropriated for the various branches of expenditure in the public service shall be applied solely to the objects for which they are respectively made, and for no others.

In February, 1873, Congress appropriated $3,200,000 for the building of eight steam-vessels of war. It is admitted that a large part of this specific appropriation was diverted and used for other purposes, with the intention, however, it is said, of refunding out of the general appropriations. It is further claimed that this diversion was caused by the Virginius excitement in November, 1873, in preparing for war. Such occasions can afford no excuse for violation of law; but it so happens that the proof shows that part of it had been diverted at the Norfolk navy-yard in rebuilding the Galena as early as April, 1873, part upon the Swatara and part in payment of old bills made prior to the passage of the law. The official letter of Hanscom, Chief of Bureau of Construction and Repairs, to the commandant of the Norfolk navy-yard, dated April 3, 1873, contains this order:

One hundred and fifty additional men may be employed and work upon the Galena which may be charged to the appropriation. Construction of eight steam-vessels of war, and the amount charged back again after July next.

Another remarkable instance of a confessed violation of these statutes is the admission of the Secretary that the "pay account" of the Navy owes "clothing" about $1,000,000. That is, the clothing fund, which has been created in past years by charging officers and men 10 per cent. above cost on their clothing, had been depleted $1,000,000 by using that amount for the pay of the Navy, notwithstanding regular annual appropriations have always been made to pay the salaries of officers and the wages of sailors.

In connection with these statutes, I ask the attention of the House to the transfer of funds by order of the Secretary to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., in London. Captain T. S. Fillebrown, on page 117, Miscellaneous Testimony, testifies among other things as follows:

The Secretary of the Navy sent for me on one occasion when Commodore Reynolds was absent and asked what amount of money had been spent by the Bureau of Equipment and Recruiting abroad annually. I told him about $200,000 or $250,000 perhaps. He then asked me the state of the funds belonging to the Bureau; what quantity we had on hand. I told him about $750,000 or $800,000 possibly; and he directed me to transfer to his office, to the credit of the pay of the Navy, $200,000 from the appropriation for equipment.

Question. You say "to his office;" what do you mean by that?

Answer. That is the pay of the Navy. The pay of the Navy is all to the credit of the Navy Department. The money was in this case taken from the appropriation for the equipment of vessels and transferred to the pay of the Navy. A short time after this conversation with the Secretary of the Navy, I met the chief clerk of the Bureau of Construction, and he asked me if I had seen the Secretary of the Navy to-day, and I said I had. He said, "Did he get anything from you?" Said I, "Two hundred and odd thousand dollars." Said I, "Did he get anything from your Bureau?" He said, "Yes; $175,000." I asked, "Where did it go; what was it for?" He said he did not know, but it was transferred from his office to the pay of the Navy.

Q. Do you remember what time that was?

A. My impression is that it was early in 1872.

Witness must mean 1873.

I afterward heard that all this money had been sent to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. "They were shaky," to use the expression I heard.

H. A. Goldsborough, chief clerk of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, testifies on page 141, Miscellaneous Testimony:

I think in 1872—

He must mean 1873—

we got an order to transfer $200,000 and pass it to the credit of Paymaster Cutler in New York. What it was for we did not know. The same thing, I understand, was done by the other Bureaus.

Question. Did any such thing ever occur before during your connection with the Bureau?

Answer. No, sir.

Q. Has it ever occurred since?

A. No, sir. * * *

Q. That amount of money which was withdrawn from the appropriations for your Bureau was never returned to the benefit of the Bureau, as you know of, in any way?

A. No, sir; I don't think it ever was; but the systems up there of transfers is very complicated, and one could not tell how it was done.

After the Secretary of the Navy succeeded in having these large amounts placed in the hands of Paymaster Cutler in New York, he perpetrated still further violations of the statutes which I have read in sending this money to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., in London. I charge that he sent it in violation of law and for the personal benefit of the recipients. The Secretary denies this, and says that he sent it only in continuance of the foreign account and for the purpose of paying our foreign drafts. On the 18th of September, 1873, Jay Cooke & Co., the parent house in America, failed. On the 22d of the same month there was an unexpended balance in the hands of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. belonging to the Government, as shown by the Treasury books, of £166,932 2*s*. Hugh McCulloch, of that firm, was then in America, and J. O. Bradford, Paymaster-General of the Navy, was then in London. They both assured the Secretary that if this balance was withdrawn the house in London would go under. It cannot be denied, under the proof, that with the priority of the United States' claim under the bankrupt laws upon the private estates of Hugh McCulloch and Jay Cooke and Henry Cooke in America, and with the securities then placed in the hands of the Secretary, that he could have saved every cent of that balance then due from Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. Instead of stopping the account and saving harmless the Government, he went forward, and through Cutler and J. O. Bradford he added to that indebtedness £219,199 11*s*. 11*d*., taking, as he alleges, additional collaterals sufficient to secure it. To quote his own language, see Appendix to Miscellaneous Testimony, pages 242 and 243:

The regular time for a new remittance to the said foreign account, in usual course, came about the 1st of October, 1873, and the Department was then applied to by the representatives of said firm to make such new remittance, but declined to do so at that time, though our Navy drafts were still paid in due course by said firm as our agents as aforesaid. About the middle of said month of October, 1873, however, it became necessary either to make new remittances to the said account or allow our agents to stop the payment of our drafts.

Now the proof directly contradicts this entire statement. His own requisitions upon the Treasury and the remittances by Cutler to said foreign account show that on the 24th of September, 1873, there was sent forward £100,000; September 26, 1873, £100,000; September 27, £10,000; October 4, 1873, £62,937 1*s*. 3*d*.; October 6, 1873, £37,863 6*s*. 10*d*. And the official telegrams which passed at this time between the Secretary of the Navy at Long Branch and New York to Commodore Reynolds at Washington show on the part of Mr. Robeson a most inconsiderate haste to get this money to London. Now if this £219,109 11*s*. 11*d*. was turned over to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. for the purpose of paying our drafts, why, at the same time, was Paymaster-General Bradford being furnished with additional funds by the Secretary of the Navy for the same purpose?

Between the 24th of September, 1873, and the 6th of December, 1873, as shown by Cutler's vouchers, Bradford received the enormous sum of £435,345 17*s*. 1*d*. Of this amount he paid to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. £219,199 11*s*. 11*d*.; and what did he do with the rest of it? He swears that he used it to pay off our foreign drafts, including those accepted by Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. I will give his own words on page 586 of miscellaneous testimony:

Well, sir, I have been there in London ever since—

That is, since the panic, September 18, 1873—paying the drafts of the United States officers as they came. They were drawn, until recently, most of them on Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. * * *

Question. At what time in 1873 was it that the Secretary of the Navy commenced remitting money to you with which to meet drafts drawn upon Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co.?

Answer. It was in September, 1873—September or October; perhaps not until the early part of October.

With these facts and figures in his possessionno reasonable man can escape the conclusion that the statement of the Secretary thatthe remittance of £219,199 11*s*. 11*d*. through Bradford to Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. was to meet our foreign drafts is untrue. The drafts were met by Bradford with other moneys sent him for that purpose, and the money that went to the portfolio of the said firm was a loan for their personal benefit on collaterals furnished for its security. It was a plain, palpable, dangerous violation of law.

There is another perversion of appropriations from their legitimate objects which has grown into a most dangerous practice by the present administration of the Navy, involving vast expenditures of public money without the knowledge of Congress. I allude to the building of new vessels, not out of the materials of the old ones, but simply out of their names, and putting it under the head of repairs. If this can be done, then Rear-Admiral Steedman well say that "the Navy has declared its independence of the Government." Under such a system there can be no restraints, no frugality, no accountability.

Even in the case of the ordinary repairing of vessels the law has been disregarded. Section 1538 of the Revised Statutes provides that no more than $3,000 shall be expended at any navy-yard in repairing the hull and spars of any vessel until the necessity and expediency of such repairs has been ascertained by a proper examining board. In all the cases of important repairs brought to the knowledge of the committee they have not found an instance where this highly salutary law in the line of retrenchment has been complied with.

Section 1541 directs the Secretary of the Navy to sell at public sale such vessels and materials of the Navy as in his judgment cannot be advantageously used, repaired, or fitted out, and shall make a full report to Congress at the opening of each session of such sales, the amounts realized, the names of purchasers, &c. This statute being plain and mandatory in its terms, it is curious to know how the Secretary could even frame a pretext for its evasion. But he was equal to the emergency. Whenever he finds a ship that cannot be "advantageously used, repaired, or fitted out," he puts a force on it, has it broken up, and sells or barters it privately as "old scrap."

How the Government and people are served in these kind of operations can best be illustrated by the following example: The Wassue and Shawnee being unfit for use were put up at public sale, and McKay, one of the favorite contractors with the Navy, was the successful bidder. He paid his check of $13,000, covering the percentage of the bid required to be deposited on day of sale. Iron soon after declined, McKay refused to comply with his bid, and never paid the check. These vessels are then ordered to be broken up, and the contract for their destruction is given to Powers & Co. at a price about equal to their value.

The true secret of all this is that, if old vessels are sold at public sale and the sales reported to Congress, the law requires the proceeds to be covered into the Treasury and the Secretary of the Navy loses all control of the money, but if they are broken up into old scrap he holds to the proceeds independent of the Treasury. Besides, he has control of the job for breaking them up.

In defiance of section 1544, which requires laborers in the navy-yards to be employed by the proper officers in charge and solely with reference to skill and efficiency, the Secretary has directly and repeatedly interfered to designate by name parties who should be employed as laborers in the yards, and in some instances, as the proof shows, "has had skillful workmen removed and unskillful ones put in their places;" and no one can doubt that when chiefs of Bureaus ordered large forces put on in the yards just previous to elections at Boston, Portsmouth, and Norfolk, because "the Administration desired the success" of certain republican candidates, that such orders emanated directly from Mr. Robeson. How else, except through him, could they know "the desires of the Administration?" This shameful and illegal abuse of patronage has discouraged and demoralized the honest, industrious, and skilled mechanics, and has resulted in untold waste of money and material.

Section 3732 of the Revised Statutes, which prohibits contracts or sales on behalf of the United States unless the same are authorized by law and under an appropriation adequate to their fulfillment, (with certain specific exceptions,) has been openly violated, not only in the rebuilding of vessels under the name of repairs, but in the purchase by the Navy Department of the vessels Dispatch, Rio Bravo, and Sea-Weed. In years past, before this law was enacted, these powers in a few instances had been exercised by Secretaries of the Navy, and the present Secretary seizes upon their action as a precedent justifying his open violation of the statute. In all these dealings of the Secretary with old material, old scrap, and old ships, we have a new and unique illustration of the old couplet:

Ay me! what perils do environ
The man that meddles with cold iron.

The systematic infractions of law and the fraudulent abuses of patronage practiced in the purchase of the immense supplies of the Navy have been a great source of extravagance and waste.

Purchases under Bureau orders and by what is called "open purchase" have almost entirely superseded, under this administration, bids after due advertisement, as required by sections 3709 and 3718 of the Revised Statutes, or when such bids are resorted to they are perverted in most cases for the benefit of favorite contractors. To give one instance out of thousands: It is shown by the testimony of W. H. Wallace, at Brooklyn, that S. P. Brown obtains a Bureau order in October, 1873, after the panic had set in, to supply iron to certain navy-yards. He procures the said Wallace, who is an iron-dealer in New York, to furnish the iron, without the least trouble or expense to himself, at the market price; but in making out the bills against the Government an enormous profit is added, charging six and one-fourth cents per pound for bar-iron delivered at Brooklyn as late as May, 1874, and $73 per ton for Thomas pig, as late as November, 1873, delivered at Mare Island. After paying Wallace a commission of 5 per cent., he made under this one order a clear profit of $12,114.21.

The fraudulent perversion of bids for the profit of favorite contractors is usually accomplished in one of two ways. A small quantity of the article needed is advertised for; general dealers do not care to trouble themselves with bidding for a trifling matter, or, if they bid at all, it will be at retail prices. The contractor in the ring bids lower and then prevails on the Bureau to allow a larger quantity to be furnished. To illustrate: James Norcum, assistant inspector of timber at Washington navy-yard, testifies that this same S. P. Brown, under a contract to furnish 30,000 feet of lumber at $90 per thousand, gets in under that contract 635,000 feet at the same price.

The other way of perpetrating these frauds is for a number and variety of articles under different classes to be advertised, and the favored contractor in his bid will put a large profit on those which he knows will be most needed and put a price below cost on those which can be dispensed with; and when the average is taken his bid is found to be below that of the general dealer not in the ring who puts a reasonable profit on all articles; and the successful bidder is afterward excused from furnishing the articles upon which the lowest prices are put.

Now, is it possible that this long system of abuses and frauds under contracts for furnishing supplies to the Navy could go on without coming to the knowledge of the head of the Department? The proof shows that in several instances his attention was specially called to it, and he took no steps to remedy it; but on the other hand, in the case of S. P. Brown's contract to furnish granite at Mare Island, he interposed for the protection of Brown after he had several times made default, the result of such interference being that said Brown was finally allowed to furnish granite inferior to that contracted for, at an increased price.

I will not longer weary the House by reciting cases where the Secretary has openly trampled upon the laws and refused or failed to perform his plainest duties, although many more are at hand. But before leaving this subject, however, I will call attention to that portion of the minority report which alleges that the act of 1844, which required foreign fiscal agents to be appointed with the advice and consent of the Senate and is now incorporated in section 1550 of the Revised Statutes, was at the time of the appointment of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., in 1871, "superseded by other laws." The minority do not condescend to state the laws that superseded it. It was never repealed. The act of 1854, recited by them for another purpose, did not supersede it. This law requiring a fiscal agent to give a bond certainly would not repeal by implication a law requiring, in case he was a foreign fiscal agent, his appointment to be made by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The general subtreasury law of 1846 could not supersede it.

The rule of construction as laid down in Dwarris on Statutes, and which Mr. Robeson, in the Blair investigation, when using it for another purpose, swore was good law in his opinion, is as follows. I read from testimony of the Secretary, page 369, of Blair's investigation:

"It is a general rule of legal construction that a general statute without negative words will not repeal the particular provisions of a former one unless the two acts are irreconcilably inconsistent. The reason and philosophy of this rule is that when the mind of the legislator has been turned to the details of a subject and he has acted upon it, a subsequent statute in general terms, or treating of the subject in a general manner, and not expressly contradicting the original act, shall not be considered as intending to affect the more particular and positive previous provisions, unless it is absolutely necessary to give the latter act such a construction in order that its words shall have any meaning at all."

No, it was not that this law was superseded that constituted in my opinion the real reason of ignoring its provisions and appointing the firm of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. our foreign fiscal agents without the advice and consent of the Senate. The Secretary could not afford to fail in his project of having them as his fiscal agents; and he doubtless apprehended that if the name of Hugh McCulloch was sent to a republican Senate it might fail of confirmation. The records of the Senate show that Baring Brothers & Co. were confirmed in 1844 as our foreign fiscal agents, and Seligman & Brothers in May, 1876. Why not Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. in 1871?

There are other derelictions upon the part of the Secretary that are more serious than even the violations of express statutes.

The testimony of Paymaster Billings, and Burtis, clerk to chief engineer, shows the board which discovered the frauds of Buckley and Peterson to the amount of $5,000 reported to the Secretary that they were satisfied that if he would enlarge their precept that they could establish other frauds; but this he failed to do, and soon thereafter dissolved the board, and he continued the chief engineer in office notwithstanding the evidence established that these frauds could not have been perpetrated without gross negligence or guilty participation upon his part.

Commodore Nichols testifies that a Mr. Spooner, at the Boston yard, was detected in the grossest frauds and was reported to headquarters at Washington, but they failed to have him dismissed.

Admiral Steedman testifies that frauds in connection with what is called "hide cuttings" were traced to and clearly fixed upon certain parties whom he suspended, and they were reported to Washington; but an order came to put the principal offender back on duty, where he remained till his death. While one M. M. Kaighn was drawing pay as a clerk in the Land Office, William W. W. Wood, Chief of Bureau of Steam Engineering, sent the following order to the commandant of Washington Navy-Yard:

The Hon. Secretary of the Navy orders that Maurice M. Kaighn be placed on the rolls at the Washington Navy-yard, at $3.25 per diem.

Civil Engineers Asserson at Norfolk and Granger at Boston, though proven guilty of malfeasances, were likewise retained. The Secretary has allowed the clerk Henrique to remain in his most responsible position, after Veeder, a special agent of the Navy, had made his character of dishonesty fully known to the Secretary. His bad character is further shown before this committee by the witness Wolfe, who is so fiercely attacked in the minority report. Nobody was brought to impeach Wolfe's character as a witness, and the parties who contradict him are the Browns and this man Henrique, the guilty parties themselves in the frauds proven by him.

This minority report further says that Wolfe was in a state of delirium from too much drink when he testified. The fact is, he had been in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms overnight for his refusal to testify against Henriques the day before, and had had nothing to drink, but under the excitement and terror of being arraigned before the House as a recusant witness, and being subject to an affection of the heart, fainted in the presence of the House. Yet they charge that when he testified he was in a state of delirium. For my part I was fully impressed with the truthfulness of his statement.

The two most important offices connected with the Navy Department are the Bureau of Construction and Repair and the Bureau of Steam Engineering; yet the Secretary continues I. Hanscom in the one and William W. W. Wood in the other, when it is apparent to every unprejudiced mind acquainted with his administration that they are in a large measure directly connected with its abuses and frauds. He appointed Drayton a timber agent to protect live oak timber in Florida, when he knew that he was only going to Florida on a visit, and would not see the timber; and after Drayton's return to New Jersey he continued to draw his pay for months.

Vickers, another citizen of New Jersey, was paid out of the contingent fund as a detective, but was sent by the Secretary as coal agent to Samoa. The Secretary of the Navy ordered the name of one John Chamberlain, whom he says he never saw but once, to be placed on the Navy pay-rolls at Norfolk at $3.25 per day. The testimony shows that no such man was ever at Norfolk; but his pay was forwarded regularly each month to Hanscom at Washington from 1872 to December, 1875. Hanscom says he turned over his pay to one McFarland, who is now dead, but without authority from Chamberlain. This was going on for nearly four years. The Secretary says that Chamberlain was a detective; yet he saw him only once, Hanscom only once; they have never seen him since. He drew pay for four years through a man now dead. We think it to be high time that this detective was reporting at headquarters!

Paymaster Clark's testimony taken at Kittery shows that a clerk in his office, one R. D. Bogart, had embezzled or stolen about $30,000 from the Government; that he was court-martialed and sentenced to the State's prison for three years. The Secretary of the Navy set aside the sentence upon the point, as stated by Clark, that Clark having appointed another clerk within ten days after Bogart cleared out, it was equivalent to an acceptance of a resignation and that he was only amenable to the civil authorities. The United States court refused to take jurisdiction and turned him back to the Navy. Bogart then made his escape and went to San Francisco. He was there re-arrested and tried again by a court-martial and sentenced to four years' imprisonment in the State penitentiary. He was never placed in prison but was put upon the receiving-ship at Mare Island, remained on board about a year, again made his escape, and came to Washington, where he is now at large as a reporter, the attention of the Secretary having been called to the fact.

The minority report attempts to speak very contemptuously of the furniture built for the Secretary at the Washington navy-yard. They quote no testimony, but assert the fact to be that the Secretary "was induced, at the suggesting of Childs, the foreman of the joiners, to have a sideboard made there for his house, and also a small baptismal fount for a chapel near his sea-side residence in New Jersey."

Now the testimony of Ferguson, Gordon, Meads, McCoy, Burton, O'Donnell, and others taken at the Washington navy-yard shows that there was made under Childs's direction for the Secretary of the Navy a fine mahogany extension-table, all new except one top piece taken from an old one sent there by the Secretary to be repaired; a fine hat-and-coat stand; a highly finished and handsome sideboard, estimated by the above witnesses to be worth from $350 to $400; a dumb-waiter, fancy boxes, and the baptismal font. McCoy, the clerk of Childs at the time, shows that most of the labor on these articles was paid for by the Government, besides other labor that went upon the house of the Secretary. The witness Bouttscher, relied upon to sustain Childs, is positively contradicted by all the witnesses examined who saw the furniture in process of construction. Childs is proven to be a man of bad character, and is not to be credited where he is interested. He alone swears that he replaced the lumber used for the Secretary, and produces bills to show it.

All this proceeding upon the part of Childs and the Secretary, to say the least of it, was highly irregular and illegal, and was kept concealed from the commandant of the yard.

Why did not the Secretary apply to the commandant of the yard if he thought it proper to have his funiture made by Government mechanics out of Government material? Why did he act through such a disreputable character as Childs is shown by the proof to be? Commodore Patterson testifies that the doing of these things within the yard by Childs in concealment from the commandant was dishonest.

This minority report is full of bold and bald assertions, but from beginning to end quotes evidence (excepting a few lines from Captain Shufeldt and Admiral Porter) from only two witnesses; and, pray, who are they? Contractor Bigler and Secretary Robeson!

I am sorry that my limited time will not allow me to discuss the connection of the Cattells with the Navy and their relations with the Secretary. We have direct proof of more than $300,000, received by them for the sale of their influence with the Navy Department to contractors. Everywhere in the naval service their polluting touch has been felt and during all the time the Secretary is most closely connected with them. They buy property together, they loan their credit to one aonther, and there is mutual borrowing and lending of money; but they all the while manage to keep the Secretary largely in their debt. Veeder long since informed the Secretary of their vile practices of selling influence to contractors; but he passes it by and continues his relations with them. It is true, that when some contractor once or twice mentioned their names to him he gave him promptly to understand that they had no influence with him. What else could he have said? This argues nothing. Whether guilty or innocent, he could have made no other reply without a confession of guilt. But the minority report, while admitting a close intimacy on the part of the Secretary with A. G. Cattell, denies that there was any intimacy with E. G. Cattell. He had most of his business transactions with E. G. Cattell. When he went to Philadelphia he shared his hospitality, and the dispatches which passed between them showed the greatest familiarity. What is to be thought of such dispatches as these? "To you and yours a merry Christmas;" "A happy New Year to you and yours;" "Will. Bettle and myself will breakfast with you to-morrow morning at eight o'clock;" "Telegram received; will leave first train; will come to your house." All of these from E. G. Cattell to George M. Robeson. They could be multiplied almost indefinitely. What becomes in the face of these of the denial of intimacy by the minority report?

But I am admonished that I must bring this hurried review to a close. Imperfect as it has been I hope it has not failed to impress this House with a sense of an imperious necessity for reform in the naval service.

Mr. Speaker, let us endeavor to purify this Government and bring it back to the principles of our fathers. The people demand it at our hands. Every day's report brings us news of failures, bankruptcies, and homes darkened with gloom and despair.

Virtue and patriotism cry out for us to stay the tide of vice, misgovernment, and misrule. Is their voice to be drowned by bitter partisan speeches, invoking the dark memories of war with the intent of lashing the northern mind again into fury? I trust not. My section is poor, unable to bear these heavy burdens. I know that the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] has several times upon this floor ridiculed the idea of the South being poor. This shows a great ignorance upon his part of our true condition. I admit that since the people of Alabama have again obtained in their own hands the reins of our State government matters have improved. We have thus been able to secure a fair administration of justice and protect our crops and stock in some measure from the rogues that prowl our plantations. But a poorer civilized people never lived in the world. At the present prices of upland cotton this year's crop cannot pay the expense of raising it.

We have in Alabama a rigid system for the assessment and collection of taxes. Yet what does the gentleman suppose to be the sum total of our taxable property of all kinds as shown by the State auditor's report of 1874? Only $159,000,000. Think of it; a million of people, covering an area of 50,000 square miles, rich in all natural resources and possessing only a hundred and fifty-nine millions of taxable property, with heavy State and county debts upon us; with hospitals for the insane, deaf, dumb, and blind to support; prisoners and paupers to feed; public schools to sustain; and the current expenses of government to pay. I could point the gentleman to two men in the city of New York whose joint wealth will exceed the entire taxable property of the whole people of Alabama. This is not owing to a want of industry upon the part of our people. I have seen the widows of dead confederate soldiers who had once lived in comfort holding the plow in their delicate hands to make bread for their hungry little ones. Moreover we have been surrounded by difficulties which you cannot appreciate, difficulties which sap the spirits, perplex the minds, and wring the hearts of men. One of the most serious calamities which can befall a civilized people is a radical destruction instead of a gradual modification of established orders.

There is not a people in the world so misunderstood, so misjudged, as those that I have the honor in part to represent. Whatever additional calamities may be in store for the South, this much I can say for her: no earthly power can ever deprive her of the courage and manhood of her sons and the delicacy and devotion of her daughters.

Mr. DANFORD obtained the floor.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The gentleman from Ohio yields to me to move that the House adjourn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will yield to me to move that we have an evening session for debate only.

Mr. DANFORD. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee to move that the House adjourn, and for no other purpose.

Mr. HOLMAN. I only wish to move by unanimous consent for an evening session for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. DANFORD. Not on this subject?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, of course not on this subject.

Mr. DANFORD. I do not know that I shall object if I am not taken off the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not interfere with the right of the gentleman from Ohio to-morrow morning after the reading of the Journal to go on with the discussion of the report of the Naval Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move, then, by unanimous consent that the session this evening be set apart for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. HALE. I object.

Mr. HOLMAN. There are several gentlemen who wish to make speeches.

Mr. RANDALL. On both sides of the House.

Mr. HOLMAN. And this is the only opportunity they will have.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Monday next.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will entertain that motion after this unanimous consent is settled.

Mr. HALE. At the request of gentlemen on both sides of the House I withdraw my objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the session this evening for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted?

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. Yes; I object.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I renew the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WELLS, of Mississippi. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman from Mississippi withdraws his objection to the session for debate only this evening, and I hope there will be no further objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must see the Chair cannot hold this proposition open all the evening.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the House take a recess until eight o'clock this evening, and that the session then to be held shall be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. This does not interfere with the subject now before the House, nor with the right of the gentleman from Ohio to-morrow morning to go on with his speech?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. HOLMAN. The session for to-night is for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted.

Mr. BANNING. On what subject?

Mr. HOLMAN. On any subject.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. There are five hours' additional debate to be allowed on the report from the Naval Committee.

Mr. HOLMAN. The session this evening has nothing to do with that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the House takes a recess until eight o'clock this evening the session will be for debate only, no business whatever to be transacted. The right of the gentleman from Ohio to the floor to-morrow is reserved.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I object.

Mr. O'NEILL. I move that when the House adjourn it will be to meet on Monday next.

The motion was disagreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. WHITTHORNE, (at five o'clock p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York: The petition of Mary Callan, for a pension, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS: The petition of Jeptha Rubert, for a pension, to the same committee.

By Mr. WILLIAMS, of Indiana: The petition of the Board of Trade of the city of Indianapolis, for a continuation of the fast-mail service, to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads.

By Mr. BEEBE: The petition of citizens of Newburgh, New York, for the continuance of the fast-mail service, to the same committee.

By Mr. McDILL: The petition of the common council of Council Bluffs, Iowa, that the United States grant to said city the lake known as Spring Lake, situated within the limits of said city.

By Mr. SAMPSON: A paper relating to the bill providing for the granting of a pension to Mrs. Dinah Brown, of Drakeville, Iowa, to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 29, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REDEMPTION OF LANDS HELD FOR DIRECT TAXES.

Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent of the House to take up the motion by which the House laid upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 84) extending the time for redemption of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes, was passed. It is for the purpose of making a formal correction in order to prevent any possibility of doubt or mistake as to the meaning of that act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information.

The bill was read. The first section provides that the time within which lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes may be redeemed be extended to the 1st day of February, 1877, and that all acts or parts of acts inconsistent therewith be repealed.

In its second section it provides that the expenses already incurred in preparing for the sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes may be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated by law.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to reserve objection. I should like to have the gentleman from Georgia state what is the parliamentary condition of the bill.

Mr. HILL. I have no objection to stating it. It is a Senate bill which was passed by this House extending the time authorizing the redemption of lands sold under the direct-tax acts of the United States. At the time the bill was on its passage——

Mr. HOAR. When?

Mr. HILL. A few days ago. It has not been sent to the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is a Senate bill which passed the House two or three days ago. The Chair is informed by the journal clerk that it was passed on Monday last. A motion was made to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and that motion was laid upon the table. The gentleman from Georgia now asks to take up by unanimous consent the motion laying upon the table the motion to reconsider, so as to get the bill again before the House for correction.

Mr. HOAR. Has the passage of the bill been certified by the Speaker?

Mr. HILL. No; it has not been certified by the Speaker.

Mr. HOAR. This is a matter in reference to which we ought to be quite sure.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has been certified by the Clerk. It has not been delivered to the Senate. Why it has not been delivered to the Senate, the Chair is not advised.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. The amendment is very desirable.

Mr. HILL. It is.

Mr. HOAR. Then there is so much more reason for caution. It is important in reference to just such matters we should be entirely correct. I do not, however, impose any objection to the gentleman from Georgia.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion to reconsider by unanimous consent is taken from the table.

Mr. HILL. The bill is now before the House on the motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider will be considered as rejected. The question next recurs on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HILL. I now move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now before the House for amendment.

Mr. HILL. I move to amend the first section by striking out the words in the first, second, and third lines, "within which lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes may be redeemed," and inserting in lieu thereof, "limited for redemption of direct-tax lands by the act entitled 'An act to provide for the redemption and sale of lands held by the United States under the several acts levying direct taxes, and for other purposes,' approved June 8, 1872."

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will explain to the House that when this bill was on its passage the other day the question was asked whether it perfected the United States in the possession of the lands reserved for cemeteries and other public and national purposes. I stated to the House that the bill unquestionably did, and it was intended the bill should pass with those limitations. I do not doubt that that is the true construction of the bill as it passed. My mind is as clear on that subject now as it was then. But some gentlemen on the committee think doubts might possibly be raised; and upon a critical examination of the bill as it passed the Senate, we saw that the act of 1872, which contains these limitations, was not distinctly and by terms referred to. As that act was not distinctly and in terms referred to, a possibility might arise that there might be a doubt as to whether the limitations of that act were preserved in this act. This amendment seeks to correct that mistake, and to pass the bill precisely in the language of the act of 1872, containing the identical restrictions referred to. I think it was perhaps a little careless in the Senate not to use the identical language of the act of 1872.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The act of 1875.

Mr. HILL. Yes; the act of 1875, continuing the act of 1872, with a limitation. This amendment removes all possible doubt on that subject. And as the House was kind enough to pass this bill under the assurance of the Ways and Means Committee that these limitations were still preserved, I think it better that there should be left no possible doubt on the question. This amendment has been prepared in the committee, and I am instructed to report it to remove all possible doubt.

Mr. HALE. I hope this will be done, as the House undoubtedly the other day understood that all the Government interests were fully protected by the bill.

Mr. HILL. I still think they are protected, but it is desirable that there should be no possible doubt about it.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from Georgia thinks there is no need of this; but some of us think there is; and in deference to our judgment he seeks to make this amendment.

Mr. HILL. Precisely so.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill, as proposed to be amended, be read.

The bill, as proposed to be amended, was read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HURLBUT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. BLAND. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. BLAND. I desire to know of the Speaker whether, if a gentleman holding the floor yields it for any purpose, he does not lose it altogether?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That does not necessarily follow. This proceeding has been by unanimous consent; and the regular order being demanded, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] is entitled to the floor on the question of the consideration of the report from the Naval Committee. But before the gentleman proceeds, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. POWELL] desires to make some reports from the Committee of Accounts.

PAY OF CLERK OF COMMITTEE.

Mr. POWELL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Accounts the following resolution:

Resolved, That the pay of the clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department be, and is hereby, increased $1 per day; said increase to date from date of appointment.

Mr. HOLMAN. I object.

PAY OF A LABORER.

Mr. POWELL. I am also instructed by the Committee of Accounts to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid out of the contingent fund to Charles Christian, for his services as laborer in the office of the Sergeant-at-Arms, $50 per month for the time of actual service.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire where that resolution comes from?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is reported by the gentleman from Pennsylvania from the Committee of Accounts.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. POWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAYMENT FOR CLEANING OF HALL.

Mr. POWELL. I am also instructed by the Committee of Accounts to report the resolution which I send to the desk.

Mr. BLAND. I demand the regular order after this.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Clerk of the House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay out of the contingent fund to John H. Shaw, Richard H. Shaw, Wilson Grice, Robert Coates, Henry Hall, and William H. Hall the sum of $50 a month from the date when they were respectively sworn in for the services which they have rendered in cleaning and caring for the Hall and the rooms adjoining thereto; and, further, that there shall be deducted from the amount to be hereafter paid such sum or sums as they may have respectively been paid during this session.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. POWELL moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BANNING. I have a matter that I know this House ought to act upon.

Mr. BLAND. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order for the present, and will let the thing run loose, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a small private bill, Senate bill No. 852.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] if there be no objection.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object, and call for the regular order.

Mr. HOLMAN. We shall certainly reach the business on the Speaker's table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Prior to enforcing the regular order, the Chair desires to lay before the House certain executive communications.

INCREASE OF CAVALRY REGIMENTS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a communication from General Sheridan recommending an increase of the strength of certain cavalry regiments of the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

CAPTAIN JOHN EDWARDS, JR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a copy of the report on the petition of Captain John Edwards, jr., late of the United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas, leave was granted for the withdrawal of papers from the files of the House in the case of C. W. Kiefer, no adverse report having been made.

On motion of Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, leave was granted for the withdrawal of papers from the files of the House in the case of Isaac Andrews, no adverse report having been made.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. EGBERT for one week on account of important business;

To Mr. TEESE until August 1;

To Mr. ASHE indefinitely;

To Mr. GOODE indefinitely;

To Mr. MAGOON indefinitely;

To Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS indefinitely on account of sickness in his family; and

To Mr. LANDERS, of Connecticut, an extension of his leave of absence heretofore granted for ten days on account of continued sickness.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. HAMILTON, of Indiana, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2161) for the relief of R. H. Buckner;

An act (H. R. No. 3927) making an appropriation to defray the expenses of the Joint Select Committee to Investigate Chinese Immigration;

An act (S. No. 774) to remove the political disabilities of Samuel Jones, of Virginia; and

An act (S. No. 982) providing for the completion of the Washington Monument.

CONFERENCE COMMITTEE.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair desires to announce that he has appointed Mr. SCALES as a member of the committee of conference on the Indian appropriation bill in place of Mr. SPARKS, who is absent.

[Cries of "Regular order!"]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the consideration of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, which was pending when the House adjourned yesterday, and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] is entitled to the floor upon that question.

Mr. REAGAN. I call for the morning hour; it is the regular order of business, the previous question not having been called on the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that the business pending at the time of adjournment yesterday is the regular order of business and that the morning hour does not come up until that business is concluded.

NAVAL INVESTIGATION.

The House then resumed the consideration of the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. DANFORD. Mr. Speaker, in the little time allotted me for the discussion of the report now before the House it will be impossible to more than barely allude to a few of the questions involved in the investigation upon which this report is founded. I shall indulge in no preliminary remarks, but proceed at once to a discussion of the report, of the manner of the report and its matter; and I desire to call attention in this connection to a remark made by the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. LEWIS,] my colleague upon this committee, early in his remarks on yesterday. Considering the course of this investigation, the manner in which it has been conducted, I may say that I was surprised that such a remark should fall from any member of the committee.

I quote from the speech of the gentleman from Alabama:

The present Secretary of the Navy, being fortified with seven years of experience in his office, with a patronage of $2,000,000 annually, with thousands of followers, many of whom were dependent on his will or caprice for their bread, determined to resist such an investigation as would lay bare the abuses, errors, violations of law and frauds which are given to the public in the majority report which is now pending before the House.

I repeat that I was astonished that such a declaration should fall from the lips of any member of this committee when I remember that out of more than four thousand printed pages of testimony taken by the committee fully one thousand of these pages were furnished by the Secretary of the Navy and officers of his Department in order that the committee might be aided in pursuit of the object they had in view. More than one thousand closely printed pages of this matter required four months of preparation in the office of the Secretary and in his various Bureaus, and have been furnished to the committee and are now published as a part of the testimony.

Mr. Speaker, when I remember that when this committee went armed with a commission from this body to every navy-yard upon the Atlantic coast, armed with a warrant to investigate, the committee were received, from Norfolk to Kittery, the navy-yard gates were thrown open and the committee were received with salutes that indicated the dignity and importance of the investigation; and when I remember that from the commandant of the yards to all the employés witnesses were subpœnaed and were freely offered and freely testified; when I recollect that every discharged employé around the navy-yards was free to come before the committee and tell his story whatever it might be; and when I remember that here in the rooms of the committee the doors were open to any one who might offer himself or herself as a witness to testify to any wrong or imagined abuse existing in the Department; and when I remember that during the four months of this investigation the doors were closed, absolutely closed in the face of the Secretary and his Bureau officers and every person intended to be affected injuriously by this investigation, I repeat that it does seem to me strange indeed that such a declaration should be made by the gentleman from Alabama. What witness refused to appear? What witness failed to respond to the subpœna of the committee? Out of all the hundreds of witnesses brought into the committee-room there was only one recusant witness, and he was brought before the bar of the House, but he had previously answered fully all the questions propounded to him.

I have been unable to discover in the conduct either of the Secretary of the Navy or any of his Bureau officers any disposition whatever to shirk the fullest and fairest investigation of the conduct of the affairs of the Navy Department in the last seven years of its administration.

I need not say to the House that the members of the committee did not shirk the responsibility imposed upon them by the resolutions under which they were acting. They did not fail to respond to the request of any person, so far as I am informed, who desired to come as a witness before the committee. In reading the testimony taken by the committee we find that inquiry was made of various witnesses as to whether they knew of any fraud, any error, or any abuse existing in the Department or any of the Bureaus of the Department. If a negative response was elicited, then almost universally that question was followed up with the further question, "Do you know of any person who can give us any information in relation to any frauds, abuses, or errors existing in the administration of the Navy Department?" And so witnesses were followed up; and wherever there was the slightest hope of getting at a fact which would in any way bring to the knowledge of the committee any fraud, corruption, or actual abuse in the Department, the witness was hunted up, no matter where he was, whether in the Department, or a discharged employé, or wherever he might be.

The committee went so far in their investigation of the conduct of the Secretary of the Navy and of his subordinates, the heads of Bureaus, as to bring to this city from a distant place a woman whose reputation and character were known to some members of the committee at least to be that described in the Good Book: "Her feet go down to death; her steps take hold on hell;" and she was examined in the hope that there might be elicited from her some fact that would be damaging to the Secretary or to some of his Bureau officers.

Now, it will not do to come before the House at this day and say that the Secretary of the Navy stood in the way of this investigation. After he had been excluded from the committee-room, after his Bureau officers had been excluded from this investigation for a period of four months, while hundreds of witnesses were being examined and their testimony taken, testimony intended to affect directly the integrity and character of the Secretary of the Navy and his Bureau officers, during all that time the seal of secrecy was placed on the lips of the members of the committee, of the official reporter, and of every one admitted inside of the committee-room.

After a period of four months or more, when finally the doors of the committee-room were opened to the Secretary of the Navy, a mass of testimony amounting to almost three thousand printed pages was placed in the hands of the Secretary and he was told that he might reply to it. The witnesses had been discharged. There had been witnesses who had testified at the various navy-yards of the country and were then discharged. All this testimony was placed in the hands of the Secretary, and he was given the poor privilege, without the benefit of an intelligent cross-examination of the witnesses by himself or any member of the committee, of making up his answer.

I repeat that this investigation was conducted by the committee in secret for four months as though they were preparing a case against the Secretary of the Navy and the heads of the Bureaus; as though it were the determination of the committee to fasten upon them some wrong, some fraud, something in connection with the administration of the affairs of the Department that would bring reproach upon our system. And when the Secretary of the Navy was finally admitted to the committee-room, after he had given his testimony, after the better officers had testified, the committee came to make up their report. The minority in their views submitted to the House have complained of their treatment in relation to that report, and the manner in which it was made up.

I do not know why it was that the minority of the committee (I speak of the political minority) were not called in to discuss the various questions that had been under investigation. If it was known to the majority of the committee that the minority held views upon these questions that were not in accordance with the views of the majority, as they very possibly did, then the greater was the reason why they should have been consulted, then the greater reason existed why the minority should have been consulted in relation to this report and to its character.

I repeat that after the testimony had been taken, before the testimony of the last witness had been returned to the committee-room, the minority of the committee were notified to appear at a fixed time and hear the report. We heard that report, a report that we had no share in the making of, that we had never been called to consider. Then when we asked the poor privilege of taking up that report and discussing it subject by subject, in order that we might give our views upon the various conclusions given, even that poor privilege was denied to the minority of the committee and we were given two hours in the committee-room to discuss that report.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I think it was three hours.

Mr. DANFORD. I am informed that the time allowed was three hours, and possibly it was. Such was the character of the investigation, and such the manner in which the report was made up.

I propose to call attention to a few of the matters contained in the report, a few matters that are charged against the Secretary of the Navy as being violations of law. The first subject to which I shall call attention is the transfer of funds from one Bureau in the Department to another. Upon this subject I desire to remark that the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy, the testimony of a number of Bureau officers and other officers of the Treasury Department, has been taken; and from a careful reading of that testimony, as well as from a knowledge of the appropriations themselves, it will be seen that it is a matter of impossibility for the Secretary of the Navy to transfer upon his own motion one dollar from the Bureau of Construction and Repair to the Bureau of Steam Engineering or from any other Bureau of the Department to another. The further fact is established that such a transfer never did take place in a single proven instance, save one where there was a direct act of Congress making the transfer.

Why, Mr. Speaker, these appropriations are made from year to year for the several Bureaus of the Department, and are drawn out of the Treasury only upon proper warrants, and only for the particular Bureau for which work has been done. As an instance, the Bureau of Steam Engineering has an appropriation annually made for its benefit, and it is just as impossible for the Secretary of the Navy to draw from that appropriation $1,000, or any other sum and apply it to the Bureau of Construction and Repair as it would be for any member of this body to do the same act. It stands credited upon the books of the Treasury to the proper appropriation, and upon the settlement each Bureau is charged and credited with its proper appropriation. No such transfer can by any possibility take place without a collusion that amounts to an absolute and direct fraud between the officers of the Navy Department and those of the Treasury Department. Why, Mr. Speaker, there is an officer in the Treasury whose special duty it is to look to these several accounts as they come into the Fourth Auditor's Office and to determine whether they are properly charged to the particular appropriation from which the sum is sought to be drawn.

There have been, I repeat, no transfers. The Bureau of Steam-Engineering may do work that is properly chargeable to the Bureau of Construction and Repair or to some other Bureau of the Navy Department; and that work thus done and paid for by the Bureau of Steam-Engineering will finally be adjusted when it comes into the Fourth Auditor's Office and charged to the Bureau of Construction and Repair, or whatever Bureau may be the proper one to be thus charged. This is all there is in that matter of transfer.

Much has been said in the report of the majority of the committee and in the remarks of the gentleman from Alabama yesterday in relation to this matter of transfer, as though the Secretary had absolutely taken the entire appropriation of a Bureau, made for a special and specific purpose, and transferred it by his own will to a different Bureau; used it for a different purpose from that for which it was appropriated.

In this connection I want to speak for a few moments of the use of the money appropriated for the eight sloops of war. This appropriation of $3,200,000, made by the Forty-second Congress for the special and specific purpose of building eight steam-sloops of war, was used, as the testimony of the Secretary of the Navy shows—used prior to the meeting of the Forty-third Congress, together with every other appropriation made to the Department for that fiscal year—for the purpose of putting our Navy into a condition to meet an exigency that seemed to be upon the country growing out of the Virginius affair. The country will remember that affair, will remember that in 1873 the steamer Virginius was seized by a Spanish cruiser and American citizens found on board were ruthlessly butchered in cold blood. It aroused a feeling of indignation throughout the whole length and breadth of the land; and it seemed for a time that a war with Spain was imminent. Our Navy was in no condition to meet the navy of Spain or of any of the great European powers. The Secretary of the Navy, acting as he testifies in the belief that it was his duty as the administrative officer of that Department to prepare for war, did make use of and expend the whole of the appropriation for the eight sloops in preparing the Navy for that exigency. The President of the United States, his Cabinet, every patriotic American citizen, looked to him in his preparations with anxiety, hoping that he might be ready when we were compelled to strike the blow or when the blow should come upon us.

This is one of the "violations of law" to which the attention of the American Congress is called in this report; one of the "violations of law" by the Secretary of the Navy, and perhaps the very gravest upon which the majority of this committee propose, if the Judiciary Committee shall see fit, that he shall be impeached before Congress and the country. Why, Mr. Speaker, if he had not done just what he did in this exigency he would have been derelict in his duty.

More than this, when Congress met in December the condition of this appropriation was brought at once to the attention of Congress. The Secretary came to the Committee on Appropriations and said to them, "I have expended all the money you gave me for the purpose of building these eight sloops of war; I have expended all the appropriations made for my Department; I am without money." The committee and the House and the country, responding to his demand, gave him $4,000,000 in order to replace the appropriation for the eight sloops of war as well as continue the force of the different bureaus of the Navy up to the beginning of the next fiscal year. This is one of the matters, I repeat, to which the attention of the country is called in connection with the impeachment of the Secretary of the Navy.

Another matter dwelt upon in the report of the majority is the present condition of the Navy as compared with what it was some years ago. Upon this subject I do not propose to speak further than to call the attention of the House to the rebuilding, as it is termed in the report of the majority, of old vessels under the name of repairs. The conduct on the part of the Secretary is criticised as a violation of law, and the House is to be called upon to impeach him for this conduct.

Now, I desire to state to the House just what this rebuilding of old vessels under the name of repairs spoken of by the majority of the committee consists in. Annually Congress appropriates to the Bureau of Construction and Repair a stipulated sum of money, and the present chief of the Bureau of Construction and Repair, with the knowledge and consent of the Secretary of the Navy, instead of going to the various navy-yards of the country and using his annual appropriation in the repair of a dozen or more old, rotten, unseaworthy hulks, built of white-oak timber which came down to us from the war, sloops and steamers which served their purpose, hastily constructed, some built in less than one hundred days, sent out as cruisers during the war, and which are now almost entirely worthless from defective material used in their construction—I say that instead of using his entire appropriation upon a dozen or a half dozen of those old vessels, the chief of the Bureau, with the advice and consent of the Secretary, has seen fit to go into the navy-yards and take out entirely not only its masts and spars but its keel from one of those old vessels, replacing them entirely with substantial material, especially of live oak, giving to the Navy each year in this way one good, substantial vessel which will last almost half a century. This is the manner in which the Secretary and the chief of the Bureau have been expending the appropriations for constructions and repairs from year to year. In the judgment of the minority of the committee it is the better economy and wisdom on their part to enter into this sort of rebuilding of a vessel rather than taking out a rotten plank here and there from a number of vessels which are to disappear entirely from the Naval Register in a short time on account of unseaworthiness.

Another matter complained of largely, and upon which two hundred pages of testimony have been taken, is the manner in which labor is put in the various navy-yards of the country. Just here let me remark there is, at least in the manner in which labor is employed in the different navy-yards of the country, an existing abuse. It is true now, as it has been for the last half century, that to some extent at least politicians control the labor employed in the various navy-yards. Local politicians, notably members of Congress, come to the various chiefs and commandants of the navy-yards and others having charge of the employment of labor, and in this way we have no doubt that occasionally an unskilled workman replaces a skilled mechanic. But we protest there is nothing in the testimony taken by the committee—and they have labored upon this subject in every navy-yard of the country—to show there is anything peculiar to this administration. This matter of political influence pertains to the very system of government under which we exist. And so long as we have political parties, and so long as we have affirmative principles, and especially affirmative men, this thing will exist to some exist.

The majority complain especially of the republican party and the republican Administration, for the reason that in 1862, or 1863 perhaps, certainly since the republican party came into power, Congress attempted by legislation to cure to some extent the abuses which have grown up in the employment of labor in the navy-yards of the country. The democratic party, in power in this country almost continuously since the days of Jefferson, never even made an honest attempt to cure the evil which grew up and which existed to a greater degree in 1859 and 1860 than it does to-day. The republican party did make an attempt to cure this evil so far as they had the power to cure it.

But, as I said a moment ago, this matter of laboring-men, this matter of politics in the navy-yards and every department of the Government, has existed for half a century. Take the very city of Norfolk, and there is greater complaint made of political influence in the navy-yard at Norfolk than any other place in the country. In that very city of Norfolk there is not a single uniformed or ununiformed police officer upon the streets who does not belong to the party known in Virginia as the conservative party.

Take the city of New York, take the democratic State governments throughout the length and breadth of the land, and I ask whether the employment of skilled and unskilled labor, the various watchmen about the public buildings of the country, are not employed and put in their places by reason of the fact that they belong to the party in power? This House of Representatives furnishes a notable example of political influence in the employment of subordinates. Why, Mr. Speaker, the Clerk's desk had been filled for twelve years before the democratic party came into power in this end of the Capitol by a gentleman whose honesty, integrity, and great knowledge of the business in which he was engaged made him so eminent (I am speaking now of the Clerk of the last House of Representatives) that his superior as a Clerk was never known in the history of our Government. And yet he was displaced on the very first day of the session. It may be said this is to some extent a political position, and I concede it. I do not complain that the majority put a party friend in that position. It was their right to do it, and no man of any political party of the country expected them to do anything else, and I am gratified to say the present incumbent is in all respects a perfect gentleman. They not only did this, but they went through that office and cleaned it out almost entirely. They began with the Doorkeeper's department, and they went through that in the same effective, efficient, and thorough manner. They did not stop even until they got down to the bath-rooms of the House of Representatives and removed from his place an old man who had been there for years and years in charge of the towels and the soap and the baths of the House, and replaced him by a young, vigorous gentleman from some State out West, who was in sympathy with the party in power. So with the post-office of the House, and so with every other place that the party in power in this end of the Capitol could touch. Political influence and political power were felt "all along the lines." And now it does not come with a very good grace from a committee of the House of Representatives in a majority report to complain that in the navy-yards and elsewhere throughout the country the republican party have yielded to the pressure of political influence, and that the politicians in some instances have directed the employment of labor in the various navy-yards.

But I must pass from this subject, and in fact from the entire subject in a few minutes more. I have only time to call attention to these matters in a brief and hurried way. There are many things complained of and magnified largely in the report of the majority; the testimony of witnesses, extreme witnesses, being quoted, and conclusions drawn from their testimony that a fair and full reading of the testimony will in nowise warrant. I have alluded to some of the chief matters of complaint against the Secretary of the Navy. He is charged with conniving at fraud, with being guilty of wrongs against the Government, with having betrayed the great trust reposed in him for the benefit of the whole country, and with having used it for the advancement of his personal friends. These charges are freely made throughout the length and breadth of the report. The matters that I have alluded to are specimens of the charges made, and I take it that upon a full reading of the testimony, if any gentlemen shall ever see fit to read it all, they will learn that the Secretary of the Navy has conducted the affairs of his Department in the interest of the whole country; that in the repairs put upon the Navy, that in the use of the different appropriations, and that in the general direction of the Department he has not departed from a line of honesty and faithfulness toward the country.

These charges made by the majority, this indictment made against the Secretary of the Navy may be demanded for partisan purposes. But this report affects the Secretary of the Navy in his honor. It affects him as a citizen of our common country. And it not only affects him but it affects the various Bureau officers, men who are in nowise identified with the republican party. Hanscom, Chief of the Bureau of Construction, Jeffers, Wood, Bradford. These men are in no way identified with the republican party in its management. They are men who have grown up to their places in the various Bureaus during a long life of service in the Department.

Take Bradford, the paymaster, if you please; and I want to remark here that if there is any officer of the Government that to my mind has been guilty of a single suspicious act, it was Bradford, the paymaster, in introducing and bringing together Cattell and Matthews at New York. Mr. Polk sent in his name to the Senate along with the names of his Cabinet. He was recommended by Andrew Jackson, and was for a long time a citizen of Tennessee, being a native of the State of Delaware, and never was identified with the republican party, so far as I know. And so with these various Bureau officers. They are not identified with the party in power in this Government, but are, as I believe, honorable men. Some of them have gone up from the work-bench to be heads of Bureaus. Some of them have seen service upon our ships of war in time of action; men who are gallant officers; men who have conducted themselves for twenty-five and thirty years with honesty and integrity. And yet you strike at them and strike them down upon the veriest suspicions and surmises.

You strike at the Secretary of the Navy likewise. He has spent seven years in the position of a Cabinet officer. He is still a young man, and he may well feel proud of the position he occupies and has occupied so honorably for so long a time. Perhaps in the declaration I am about to quote may be found the animus of this report. It is declared in the platform of the Saint Louis convention that the Secretary of the Navy has been enriching himself and his friends by selling his offices. I know that the democratic party of the country are hard-pressed; I know that for eight months almost they have been in session in this end of the Capitol with all the great economic questions of the day lying at their very doors; and they have failed in a session of eight months to bring to the country a single affirmative proposition of any character or kind whatever. There lies the question of our revenues just where you found it; there are the great questions of finance just where you found them; there are the questions of transportation just where you found them. Has it become necessary in order to go to the country for "Tilden and reform" that you strike down the Bureau officers of the Navy Department; that you wound the Secretary of the Navy; and that by this report you place a stigma upon their characters that is not justified by the testimony taken by this committee?

I know the disadvantage under which this House labors and must labor in forming an intelligent judgment between these reports. There are, as I have said, four thousand pages of testimony. There are but few members of this body that will ever read it. And in that testimony lies the truth of these reports. In that testimony the truth will be found as to whether the conclusions of the majority or the views of the minority are the correct deductions from all this testimony.

Mr. Speaker, this is not a political question. It is a question going to nothing else than the good name, the honor, and the integrity of these men who are affected by these resolutions. I beg of you before you pass resolutions that will affect these men, their wives and their children, for all time to come that you pause and reflect that you are sitting in this matter as a judicial body and that your vote will affect seriously and affect for all time the men who are aimed at by these resolutions. I have already trespassed, and yield the remainder of my time to my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. GARFIELD. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address myself only to one point in this report. I have read as much of it as I have had time to read; and I see that after seven months of incubation the committee have finally laid an egg out of which they are able to hatch only a doubt.

The result of all their work is that they are in doubt whether the Secretary of the Navy has violated any law or not. Being uncertain whether any living thing can be hatched from that egg, they turn it over to another committee to be set on during the summer, and, if possible, to be hatched next winter. Now the chief point in their report—the Samson of their case, as I understand it—is this: They have examined the testimony and have found what they think in one instance is a violation of the law of the United States. And it is this one allegation of a violation that I rise to speak upon. They quoted to us the statute of June 17, 1844, which is in these words:

That no person shall be employed or continued abroad to receive and pay money for the use of the naval service on foreign stations, whether under contract or otherwise, who has not been, or shall not be, appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. (5 Statutes at Large, page 703.)

This is very broad and sweeping language, and the committee say that in obedience to this statute immediately after its passage the name of Baring Brothers was sent to the Senate and by them confirmed as the foreign fiscal agents of the Navy Department. Then the gentleman turns triumphantly and says, there was again a confirmation by the Senate in 1876 of the appointment of Seligman & Brothers. Why did not the President send to the Senate the name of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., in 1873, to be confirmed in accordance with this law? The gentleman who spoke yesterday [Mr. LEWIS] said that doubtless the Secretary of the Navy refused to send in the name of McCulloch for fear the Senate would have rejected it; and, if so, the Secretary of the Navy would not have a chance to carry out his own purposes. Why was it that no names were sent in between 1844 and 1876? Why was no name sent in during that period of thirty-two years after the passage of the act of 1844? Why was no name sent in during the administrations of Polk, Taylor, Fillmore, Pierce, Buchanan, or Lincoln? Why was no name sent in during Johnson's administration? Your sword is too broad, my friend; it is double-edged and cuts both ways, backward and forward. I will answer why no name was sent in. Every man on this floor must know that all civil officers except judicial officers whose names go to the Senate for confirmation must go there upon a commission for four years unless sooner removed. I will tell you why. In 1846, two years before the first four years had expired, the independent-treasury act was passed. The sixth section of that act designates all the persons who shall receive, deposit, transfer, and pay the moneys of the United States, and if that section stood alone it would by implication repeal the section I have quoted from the act of 1844. I quote the section entire from the act approved August 6, 1846:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Treasurer of the United States, the treasurer of the Mint of the United States, the treasurers, and those acting as such, of the various branch mints, all collectors of the customs, all surveyors of the customs acting also as collectors, all assistant treasurers, all receivers of public moneys at the several land offices, all postmasters, and all public officers of whatsoever character, be, and they are hereby, required to keep safely, without loaning, using, depositing in banks, or exchanging for other funds than as allowed by this act, all the public money collected by them or otherwise at any time placed in their possession and custody, till the same is ordered by the proper Department or officer of the Government to be transferred or paid out; and when such orders for transfer or payment are received, faithfully and promptly to make the same as directed, and to do and perform all other duties as fiscal agents of the Government which may be imposed by this or any other acts of Congress, or by any regulation of the Treasury Department made in conformity to law; and also to do and perform all acts and duties required by law, or by direction of any of the Executive Departments of the Government as agents, for paying pensions or for making any other disbursements which either of the heads of those Departments may be required by law to make and which are of a character to be made by the depositaries hereby constituted, consistently with the other official duties imposed upon them. (9 Statutes at Large, page 60.)

An examination of the section shows that the old machinery of depositaries and special agents was swept away altogether, and, by implication, this section repealed the section which the committee quoted from the act of 1844. But we are not left to implication. The last section of the act (section 24) actually repeals all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the subtreasury act. And this repeal seems to have left it in the power of the heads of the several Departments to make their own special fiscal arrangements after they have drawn the money for their use, and therefore very naturally and very properly the President did not find it necessary in 1848 to send the name of Baring Brothers to the Senate, nor in 1852, nor in 1856, nor in 1858, nor at any subsequent day. It was understood by the practice of all the administrations that the subtreasury law substantially superseded all other laws on the subject.

Now, in 1854, Congress, finding that the Secretaries of the several Departments needed more special power in reference to the disbursement of money, a section was put into an appropriation bill in those democratic days, which gentlemen will find as the fourteenth section of the sundry civil bill of August 4, 1854.

And here is the section:

Whenever it becomes necessary for the head of any Department or Office to employ special agents other than officers of the Army and Navy, who may be charged with the disbursement of public moneys, such agents shall, before entering upon duty, give bond in such form and with such security as the head of the Department or office employing them may approve.

This section recognizes the power of the Secretary to employ agents, but requires him to take security from them. Now, that act of 1854, together with the section I have quoted from the subtreasury act, was accepted on all hands as dispensing with the necessity of sending in a name to the Senate for such foreign fiscal agent.

Now in 1871 a new appointment was made; the appointment of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., after consultations which are usually had by all administrations; it is not necessary to discuss the reason of that. They were made the agents of the Government. But were their names sent into the Senate? Of course not; nobody raised the question of practice, because not one of Secretary Robeson's predecessors had sent any name in for nearly one-third of a century. And the power of the Secretary was further increased by the act of July 5, 1862, providing that "all appropriations for specific, general, and contingent expenses of the Navy Department shall be under the control and expended by the direction of the Secretary of the Navy."

What now happened? When we came to revise the statutes of the United States in 1874, by one of the blunders which the revisers made in so great a work, there was embraced in it the old obsolete law of 1844. And when that came to be discovered and there was a change in 1876 in the fiscal agency of the Navy Department, and Seligman Brothers of New York were appointed, for the first time in thirty-odd years it appeared that there was a requirement in the Revised Statutes that the name should be sent in to the Senate for confirmation. And accordingly, in obedience to that old obsolete section now included in the Revised Statutes, the name of Seligman Brothers was sent in to the Senate.

And I will say here, what is common report throughout the country, that the Committee on the Judiciary of the Senate that had charge of that nomination thought there was no necessity of their ratifying the nomination. It was the general impression that, even with that provision in the Revised Statutes, they did not need to ratify the nomination of Seligman Brothers. But finally, out of abundant caution, they did ratify it.

And now we are called upon to raise the question of impeachment of Secretary Robeson for having neglected a repealed statute, which for thirty years every one of his predecessors had treated as repealed. If party rage can go further than that; if malice can seek a crazier thing to lean upon, I do not know what it is.

The doctrine of the majority of the committee is one

That leans its idiot back
On folly's topmost twig.

That is all I have to say on that point.

Now a word or two on a single other point. It is charged that the Secretary of the Navy made remittances to the concern of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. after it was in a failing condition. Now it is clearly shown in their own testimony that the remittance was made weeks before the credit of the firm had suffered any shock. The warrant passed out of the Secretary's hands and was no more under his control than under yours or mine. And because some of the drafts, which had been wandering around the world, were not presented for payment till a day or two after the crash, the committee say that therefore the Secretary made remittances after the credit of the firm was impaired. I have only time to say that the action of the Secretary was such as every sensible business man would approve.

I want to say one word in conclusion, and that is this: That good old sense of fair play that enters into the hearts and minds of all brave, manly men requires this House to do one of two things: If you believe that Secretary Robeson has done anything deserving impeachment, present your articles and vote on them. If you do not believe that, say so and drop the subject. But to hang up over his head a doubt and a threat, and to let them hang there as a menace during the heated political controversy of the pending election is unmanly and unjust. Why, sir, you might say the same thing of George Washington; you could pass this same resolution about any public servant that the nation ever had. We could say that, being in doubt whether all his acts were perfectly legal, we will turn the question over to a committee to inquire, with instructions to bring in articles if they find any act impeachable. Could you not say that about any man you ever knew who ever held any public office in this nation? Secretary Robeson is a manly man, and does not fear to meet the full responsibility of his official acts.

Now let this House do the manly thing; bring in your articles of impeachment and vote on them; recommit this report to your committee, and let them act upon it and bring in articles of impeachment if they can. We do not desire to screen anybody who has done wrong, but we do demand manly, fair play.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has expired, and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. MILLS. I will do so.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to answer the question which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] asked, why no name of a fiscal agent was sent to the Senate from 1844 to 1871 for confirmation. In my opinion, the reason was because there was no vacancy to be filled. We had but one foreign fiscal agency, and that was at London; all foreign drafts were drawn upon that house in London. From 1844 down to the commencement of General Grant's administration the Government was content to let Baring Brothers & Co., bankers of great credit, who had done so much to maintain the credit of the United States, continue to act as our fiscal agents. They had been appointed and confirmed by the Senate in 1844; and before the law required them to be so appointed and confirmed they had filled that position from 1815, and continued to fill it down to the time they were removed by this Secretary of the Navy.

These laws that they say repealed the law of 1844 contained nothing inconsistent with the act of 1844, nothing that cannot be reconciled with it. Every lawyer in this House knows that if these laws are reconcilable with the law of 1844, if they contain no negative words, the former statute remains. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as a lawyer assert that the law of 1854, which required those foreign special agents, as well as the agents at home, to give bonds, repealed the former law requiring them to be confirmed by the Senate? Is not the mere statement of the proposition sufficient to show the absurdity of the gentleman's position to any legal mind of this House? So with the subtreasury act, which he did not condescend to read to the House.

Mr. MILLS. I had not expected until yesterday evening to take any part in this debate. After I had left the House on account of indisposition, I received a note from the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs [Mr. WHITTHORNE] that I was expected to participate. I will now call the attention of the House to such facts as have occurred to me since that time.

In regard to the question that has just been presented by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] I wish to say that he has begged the question. His argument is the argument of an advocate defending a criminal. This is a question of right or wrong. It is not a question that involves the judicial interpretation of a repeal or non-repeal of a statute. The question is: Has the Secretary of the Navy done wrong in the acts complained of?

Now, sir, it is a principle of moral law that the intention is an essential element to constitute the moral quality of an action; and when we look to the intention of the Secretary of the Navy in transferring the deposits of the Government of the United States to the banking house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., I prefer to go to the words of the Secretary of the Navy himself rather than to the justification or palliation of his friends on this floor. In order that both sides of the question may go to the country—the reasons assigned by the Secretary of the Navy himself, and the defense as given by his friends on this floor—I will read his statement of his motive in transferring the funds of the Government of the United States to the possession and control of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co. It is in an epistle to Henry Clews, dated May 23, 1871:

MY DEAR CLEWS: I have your letter of the 19th instant in regard to the appointment of a fiscal agent of the Government abroad. I am sorry I was absent when you were here, for I could have explained to you personally much more fully and satisfactorily the situation of this matter. The truth is, that the Navy Department really has no fiscal agent abroad, but has hitherto kept its account with Baring Brothers & Co., of London. This account I transferred about the 1st of the present month to Jay Cooke's house abroad. This I did for the broadest political as well as financial reasons—

Not because the law was repealed at all; that does not cover the question what was the intention of the Secretary of the Navy in taking the Government funds from the possession of a house well established in the credit and confidence of the people of the world and placing them in the keeping of a house that was sinking into bankruptcy.—

This I did for the broadest political as well as financial reasons, looking to the good of the service abroad as well as strengthening the party and Administration at home. The house of Jay Cooke & Co. has, as you know, large and extended interests and influence throughout the country.

See what an able man he is, what a magnificent diplomat! He is fit to command armies; he covers the ground with such consummate ability. Listen to him:

Their connection and influence with the national banks; with the Pennsylvania Railroad, which controls the State of Pennsylvania, and which, absorbing the Camden and Amboy Railroad, now controls New Jersey, and stretches from its western terminus across many of the Western States far toward the Pacific; their interest in the Northern Pacific, and their general interest in the country make them very powerful friends where actively interested in the success of the Administration, and dangerous enemies, in vital localities, when indifferent or unfriendly.

How comprehensive the scheme he proposes in building up the Administration at home and strengthening its hold on power, rather than the interests of the Government in foreign lands!

These were some of the considerations which influenced me, and which would have still influenced me had I known of your application, which I did not at the time when I acted.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I will let this go with the defense which has been made of this conduct by the gentleman from Ohio. I will let the people of the United States read this testimony and form their own judgment whether or not the Secretary of the Navy has been actuated by any motive which casts any imputation upon the character of the action with which he stands charged before this House and the country. I will not permit him to impale us on a mere question of technicality, nor will I permit him to hide himself behind a miserable subterfuge. His motives and intentions are presented from his own pen and presented with great force, and the people of the United States can judge from the case he has made whether he is to be justified or condemned for using the moneys of the Government for the purposes set out by him in his letter.

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] attempts to extricate his friend from the condition in which he has placed himself by a piece of special pleading that might well become a lawyer, but does not meet the demands of a statesman. He says that for months and months the party in power in this House has been exerting all its influences to drag down the Navy Department and the administration of which it is a part, and that we have held our sessions in secret. I know how strong the objection to secret tribunals and star-chamber courts is in the minds of the American people, a people whose whole history is filled with protests against ex parte trials, secret tribunals, and star-chamber commissions. They have always been the ready expedients of despotism, and nothing our people have inherited from their ancestors do they hold in greater reverence than public trials, where a fair and impartial hearing is accorded to every one accused of crime.

But the argument has no power in this case because the Secretary of the Navy had his friends, devoted and able partisan friends, in that committee all the time, as zealous in his defense during all this session as they are to-day. He had all his witnesses that he desired to have examined. We gave him every opportunity to present his case before the country through the committee and through this House, and he has availed himself of these opportunities to his entire satisfaction.

It has been the custom of our fathers for hundreds of years where investigations against criminals were instituted simply as preparatory steps for bringing them to trial, to conduct those investigations in secret, as is done by our grand juries every day, in order to prevent a combination of power on the part of criminals that would thwart all investigations and set the law at defiance; and I do not know of any more appropriate place to exercise such prudence than when we were seeking testimony, nine-tenths of which had to come from officers and subordinates who were under the control of the Secretary of the Navy, who was clothed with power as despotic as that of the Czar of Russia, a power that enabled him whenever an officer of the Navy incurred his displeasure to send him to the other side of the earth, and a power which he has not been slow to exercise when the proper occasion presented itself.

The gentleman defended the action of the Secretary in repairing the old vessels of the Navy. The law of Congress requires that when a vessel is unfit to keep its place in the Navy it shall be sold at public auction and the proceeds of the sale paid into the Treasury of the United States. But the Secretary of the Navy, in order that he might keep that fund in his own hands and expend it according to his own inclinations without having to call upon Congress to place it again at his disposal, has defied the law, and broken up vessels, and disposed of the materials of the Navy. He has placed his own discretion in the place of the law. By this system he renders no account to the Treasury of what he has done with the vessels that he has broken up, and he uses the proceeds of these materials as he pleases, without calling on Congress for their consent. By this system he has claimed and exercised the right to build vessels for the Navy in defiance of law and without authority of Congress; and while it may be a very good and wise plan according to his view of it, any other man may just as well say that whatever he does in defiance of the law is better than the law itself. By so doing he simply elevates himself above the law and substitutes his own will for the law of the land.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is one point which has not been pressed before this House and which the gentlemen on the other side of the question seem to have forgotten entirely. It is one to which I desire now to ask the attention of the House. It is that charge which the chairman of the committee has characterized as "Cattellism." Mr. E. G. Cattell has amassed the sum of over $300,000 (and this will not be disputed by any gentleman of the committee) by extorting commissions from contractors in the Navy Department. He compelled them to divide their profits with him during the last four or five years, the sum of those profits amounting to over $300,000.

Mr. Cattell, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr DANFORD] stated to you, was brought to Mr. Matthews, of New York, who was a contractor with the Navy, through the instrumentality of Mr. Paymaster Bradford. Whether Cattell took the initative in the transaction or whether Mr. Matthews took the initiative is not very clearly settled between them, but through the instrumentality of this intimate friend of the Secretary of the Navy they were brought together and they concocted a scheme by which Cattell negotiated for his influence over Secretary Robeson and his influence in the Navy Department in the procuring of contracts in that Department in his line to Mr. Matthews, and Mr. Matthews was to divide the profits between them, those profits amounting to over $300,000 as I have told you. No one of the republican members of the committee will deny the truth of this statement so far as this money goes into the hands of Mr. E. G. Cattell, but they deny that any part of that fund has gone farther than Mr. Cattell's possession, or that there is any evidence which traces it into the possession of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, all lawyers know and all intelligent people know that the proof of every fact is either by positive or circumstantial testimony. In all the relations of life these two kinds of testimony are used to produce conviction in the mind. Circumstantial testimony has the same strength that positive testimony has if there is enough of it. In fact there has been a long contest among law-writers as to whether circumstantial testimony is not stronger even than that of positive proof. Whether any of these commissions have found their way into the pockets of the Secretary of the Navy is a question of circumstantial evidence, and I invite your consideration to certain strong circumstances which I hope gentlemen on the other side will be able to repel and to answer to their own satisfaction as well as to the satisfaction of the country. It would be a great relief to me could I but know that this high officer of the Government has his garments without the smell of fire upon them in connection with these transactions.

Well, what is the first circumstance? The first suspicious circumstance is this: That out of the proceeds of $309,000, so amassed by commissions on contracts in the navy-yard, Mr. E. G. Cattell builds a cottage at Long Branch, expending over $13,000 for the interest of his friend, Mr. G. M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy. He testifies that the very money he took from these contractors he expended for Secretary Robeson, and that that amount stands open upon his books. There is a portion of the proceeds of these commissions in his possession. How do his friends and defenders account for that? There is one circumstance at least that needs explanation.

The only explanation I have heard offered for it is that it is an open account which is yet to be paid by Robeson. It has been standing for years. Why has it not been paid? Secretary Robeson certainly will not plead inability. His friends will not plead inability, when he shows a bank account since he has been Secretary of the Navy of deposits in four different institutions in this country which amount to over $400,000. Why, then, with all this pecuniary ability to discharge that debt, was it permitted to stand a day after maturity? But it has stood for years and still stands open.

Another circumstance which it would be well for the Secretary of the Navy to explain is that when he was appointed Secretary of the Navy in 1869 he was a poor man. Here in this book is the highest evidence of his pecuniary condition at the time he entered the Navy Department. It is his official rendering under the income law of his income as a citizen of New Jersey. Every gentleman here knows, every citizen of the United States, that during the existence of the income law he had to render under the solemn sanction of an oath the amount of his income as a citizen to the Government. What does he make his income? He commenced in 1863 with the income law when he had $492. In 1864 he had $535. In 1865 he was not assessed. In 1866 he had no income. In 1867 he had no income. In 1868 he was not assessed. In 1869 he had $1,000 income. That is the year in which he was appointed Secretary of the Navy.

Now, commencing with 1869, from the date of that account, which is from the records of the Commissioner of the Internal-Revenue, the honorable Secretary is shown to have deposited in the bank of Drexel, Morgan & Co., the First National Bank, Camden Bank, and with Riggs & Co., of this city, large sums of money. Here they are and I will give the amounts: With Riggs & Co. he deposited in 1873, $19,193.65; in 1874, $65,825.87; in 1875, $123,293.43; in 1876, to April 4, $20,513.63. In four years his deposits with this institution were $228,826.58.

A MEMBER. His private account?

Mr. MILLS. Yes, sir; his private account. With the First National Bank, running from 1869 to 1870, he deposited $104,257.22. With Drexel, Morgan & Co., in 1873 and 1874, $35,573.34. With the Camden Bank for three years, $52,142.27. The total is $420,799.41.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not believe that all of that sum was clear profit, or that each one of those deposits is independent or disconnected from any other. But take the fact as it appears on its face, and it shows at least that he has been using during his time as Secretary of the Navy an immense sum of money—using it all the time; and yet he lets his Long Branch indebtedness of $13,000—a sum perfectly contemptible when you come to see the amount of money he handles—stand open for years; and it is yet to be settled and paid between him and his friend E. G. Cattell. How will he explain this? How do his friends explain it? What inference are we to draw from it? Is it a gift or a loan or an investment of so much of his profits in the business of his friend E. G. Cattell? I leave this circumstance to his friends who have him and his administration in their keeping, and hope they may find some way of honorable escape for their friend and political associate.

There is one other circumstance which looks a little suspicious, and that is that Secretary Robeson purchased property conjointly with Mr. E. G. Cattell on Sixteenth street, in this city, which cost $22,000, and Mr. A. G. Cattell, the brother of E. G. Cattell, advanced the money except $3,000 paid down by the Secretary, and he then gave his note for $8,000, which note was paid by E. G. Cattell. That note was paid by this same gentleman who has amassed this fortune from commissions levied upon contractors in the Navy Department.

What explanation have gentlemen to give for this? Do they still stand and lock their arms around him, indorse and vindicate his conduct, and sustain and uphold him, when such damaging testimony is brought against him and he has not answered it? What answer will they make to this? One other circumstance tending strongly to show that the Secretary is not entirely innocent of the agreement or understanding——

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman from Texas yield to a me?

Mr. MILLS. I will for a moment.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I wish to ask my friend whether the Secretary of the Navy did not pay a tax in 1865 of $7,000?

Mr. MILLS. Whether he did not do what?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Whether the Secretary of the Navy did not pay an income tax of over $7,000?

Mr. MILLS. When?

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. In 1865.

Mr. MILLS. Well, then, he had lost all that money in 1869, for he only had a thousand dollars income in 1869. It makes no difference if he had $100,000 in 1865 if he lost it all before 1869.

Mr. FRYE. Will the gentleman let me ask him a question?

Mr. MILLS. Certainly.

Mr. FRYE. The gentleman says he must have lost it prior to 1867, 1868, 1869. Did he not testify before your committee that he invested every dollar he had in United States bonds, which were exempted from tax?

Mr. MILLS. But they were not exempted from the tax by law. He did testify to that, but the gentleman as a lawyer knows they were not exempted from the payment of income tax, and the Secretary was evidently mistaken in that. Bonds, and everything else, were embraced in the income tax. In fact the legislator who drew that income law tortured his imagination to find every source he could to extort a dollar or a penny from the people for the Government of the United States. The expenditures of the Government then were immense, and revenues were required from every possible source where taxation could reach.

Now, sir, another unfortunate circumstance is the one in connection with Mr. Swift's contracts for live oak with the Government. Mr. Swift claims to be a democrat. Like Mr. Paymaster Bradford, all these fellows take refuge in the fact that they are democrats. Whenever you get them doing any wrong——

Mr. FRYE. O, no; they all go into the democracy.

Mr. MILLS. They all claim some bright spot of refuge. They know it will add respectability to them if they even claim the fact of having once been honest. [Laughter.] Mr. Paymaster Bradford says he was appointed by Mr. Polk. Lucifer was appointed by the Almighty, and was once the highest archangel that commanded round His throne; but Lucifer fell, and fell never to hope again. So this man Swift claims to be a democrat, but says he was accused of disloyalty and could not get a contract from the Government on account of the brand of disloyalty put upon him as a citizen of Massachusetts. He is the first citizen of Massachusetts I ever heard of during those four years of bloody war who had the brand of disloyalty put upon him. Mr. Cattell, if I remember the testimony rightly, told him that he was under the ban, and he had better employ him, because he had the confidence and friendship of the Secretary of the Navy; that he was a strong man. He told Swift, "You had better employ me, and I will wash all that guilty stain from you, and I will get you a contract." Mr. Swift got a contract, when he could not get it in any other way except by the aid and influence of Mr. Cattell. He did get it, and he paid the commissions until April, 1873. But Mr. Swift being a very strong man himself—I should like to ask the Chair whether my time has expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired, if he is only to occupy half an hour.

Mr. WILLIS. I give the gentleman five minutes of my time.

Mr. MILLS. Mr. Swift being a very strong man, and a man of great capital and of great energy, refused to acknowledge this party that stood between him and the Secretary of the Navy; and he went to the Secretary of the Navy and told him, "This man Cattell tells me he is a friend of yours and that I cannot get a contract without paying him commissions, and I have been doing that." Now, in that Mr. Swift was very smart. He knew the Secretary of the Navy dared not say that it was true. He knew he was bound to say that it was not true. And when he got him to say that he intended to go back to the other and say, "You have been telling me a falsehood; I told the Secretary of the Navy what you said and he told me it was not true, and I won't pay you any more." And the Secretary became ostensibly offended at Cattell. Cattell says he became very sore. He cut his acquaintance and would have nothing to do with him so far as the world was concerned. Swift did not continue paying him any more of these commissions. But we will see, Mr. Speaker, from some loving dispatches here how strong was the bond of intimacy that still existed between the Secretary of the Navy and Mr. Cattell up to March, 1876.

He says, Christmas, 1873, six or eight months afterward:

Wishing you and yours a merry Christmas.

He sent him a dispatch at Christmas-time. He does not grow remiss about that. And when New Year's Day comes he wishes him a happy New Year. Here is his dispatch:

PHILADELPHIA, January 1, 1875.

To Hon. GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington, D. C.:
Wish you and yours a very happy New Year.

E. G. CATTELL.

And I will read some others of these telegrams. Here is one of November 4, 1873:

To Hon. GEORGE ROBESON, Secretary of the Navy:
Will see you at your house about 9 o'clock to-morrow morning.

Here is another of November 14:

All right. When will you be in New York?

On November 8 he telegraphs to the Secretary as follows:

No reply to my telegram; if important to come to-night or Sunday night, prefer to-night. Will wait at telegraph office, Philadelphia, for reply.

Then on the 22d of November he telegraphs:

Do you expect to be in New York soon? If so, when? Reply.

Then on March 28, 1874:

Appointment of receiver of stores, yards, and docks remains vacant through your telegram to the commandant. We especially want the appointment of John Fox to this vacancy. The commandant approves, and will appoint if authorized by telegram from you.

A. G. CATTELL.
DELL NOBLITT, JR.

And this Mr. Noblitt was one of the gentlemen who paid the commission. He feels a very great interest in having his friend appointed to a position in the Navy at Philadelphia.

Again he says, April 8, 1874:

Received letter this morning. Will attend to request at once.

Then on May 18, 1874, he sent this dispatch:

Letter with inclosure received.

On May 18th:

Will letter mailed to-day reach you? Reply.

On June 1, 1874, there is this telegram:

To Hon. GEO. M. ROBESON,
Secretary of the Navy, Washington:
Will you be at home to-night? Reply.

E. G. CATTELL.

On March 4 there is this dispatch:

We leave in cutter General Grant, off battery, ten o'clock to-morrow to meet Senator and Minister Schenck. Would be glad to have you with us. Reply.

On July 1, 1874, A. G. Cattell sends this dispatch:

To Hon. GEO. M. ROBESON,
Fifth Avenue Hotel, New York:
If well enough, I think it highly important you come to Washington to-night. HALE has declined.

ALEX. G. CATTELL.

The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] will understand that telegram. And he repeats the dispatch, sending it to Philadelphia:

To Hon. GEORGE M. ROBESON,
Continental Hotel, Philadelphia:
If well enough, I think it highly important you come to Washington to-night. Hale has declined.

ALEX. G. CATTELL.

On July 27 A. G. Cattell sends this dispatch to Mr. Robeson:

Will Bettle and myself will breakfast with you to-morrow morning at eight o'clock.

And there are a number more of these dispatches between E. G. Cattell and Secretary Robeson, from which it does not appear by any means that the social relations that had existed between these two gentlemen had been in the least disturbed. And the business relations between them will be found to have continued to exist all the time up to last March when Mr. Cattell was still demanding the commission from these contractors and they were still paying. But as my time is out I cannot go through this discussion.

Mr. WILLIS. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. MILLS. I will not discuss these facts further. I want to allude to one point made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] before I close, and I will then yield the floor to the gentleman from New York.

The gentleman from Ohio attempted to justify the unwarrantable expenditures of public moneys on account of the Virginius affair; a matter which we all remember. I remember when I came here three years ago in November, 1873, when the news had been flashed over the wires throughout this country that an American ship had been chased by a Spanish armed vessel; that shotted guns had been fired across her decks; that she had been compelled to haul to; that she had been boarded; that her flag had been torn down; that the vessel had been taken; that her crew had been subjected to trial by court-martial on the vessel itself before she reached Cuba; that they had been condemned and executed, a number of them, in violation of international law. I remember what a flame of indignation swept over this land. I remember that I had commissions from men who had carried arms against that flag authorizing me to go to the President of the United States and tender their services to vindicate the flag that now floated as a symbol of the power and the name of their country. I remember, sir, when the Secretary of State was diplomatizing and making the people believe that he intended to avenge the insult offered to our national honor. He knew the records at New York, from which port that vessel sailed, showed that her papers were all right; that they had the impress of the broad seal of the Government of the United States on their face, and that over its decks floated the flag of the Government as the symbol of its power and protection, and consecrating every plank on its decks as American soil. He knew those facts. But, Mr. Speaker, there was another fact that he knew and the country did not know, and that was that we would not and could not encounter the navy of the weak and decaying Spanish government upon the water. He knew that our fleet at Key West had made an experimental trial of speed, and that four miles an hour was the average that could be reached; and an English author spoke of the Spanish government in these terms:

To the nineteenth-century Englishman Spain is simply an incomprehensible country, which pays no interest on her bonds. But even now, low though she has sunk in the scale of nations, she is far from insignificant at sea. A nation which has practically defied the United States cannot be classed with the small powers, however weak may be her forces on land, however torn by civil war. We suppose there can be no dispute about the fact that the United States did "cave in" on the Virginius question on account of their utter inability to cope with the Spanish fleet. Seven iron-clads, including three of the first-class, constitute the armada which the United States refused to face.

I will leave this paragraph for the contemplation of the Secretary of the Navy and his friends and the friends and defenders of his administration. If they shall be able to extract comfort from its perusal, I shall feel amply rewarded for producing it here.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. ELY asked and obtained leave to print in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings of the House some remarks upon the expenditures in the Treasury Department. [See Appendix.]

EXPENSES IN THE TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. HOOKER, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department, submitted a report in relation to captured and abandoned property and of expenses in the Treasury Department, and moved that the report, together with the evidence, be printed and recommitted to the committee.

Mr. HALE. Not to be brought back on a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HOOKER's motion was agreed to.

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I ask unanimous consent to print some remarks on the financial condition of the country.

No objection was made. [See Appendix.]

NAVAL INVESTIGATION.

The House resumed the consideration of the report of the Naval Committee.

Mr. WILLIS. Mr. Speaker, the duty of elaborately presenting such facts as justify the majority report now under consideration devolves upon my colleagues on the committee, Messrs. WHITTHORNE and LEWIS. They are quite competent for the performance of this task. It is my purpose not to discuss the merits or the issues which this controversy involves, but as a member of the Committee on Naval Affairs, charged with a weighty duty, I wish to justify my relations to this report and to refute such assaults as have been made upon the methods employed by this committee in the conduct of the investigation. We were charged by the House of Representatives to inquire into the existence of any error, frauds, or abuses that might exist under the administration of laws in the Navy Department, and to make such recommendation as to us under all the circumstances should seem fitting and proper. This has not been a trial of the Secretary of the Navy. No particular officer was charged with any specific act of guilt or malfeasance, or even of neglect. If Secretary Robeson has been under trial, so has every officer and every marine and every sailor in the Navy. Consequently what has been said with reference to the denial on the part of the committee of certain prerogatives or certain privileges to which an accused person under trial is entitled by virtue of the Constitution has no force or application as far as this committee is concerned. We did not, as has been alleged by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD,] begin by summoning the soreheads and malcontents within our committee-room in order to frame an indictment against a high official of the Government. The records will show that the very officials who at the outset of this investigation were subjected to examination were Bureau officers under the absolute and immediate direction of the Secretary of the Navy and interested in the vindication of his administration. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] says that we have occupied here an eight-months session and have nothing whatever to show for our labors. From the testimony of one of these Bureau officers examined within three days after this investigation was inaugurated, Acting Paymaster-General Watmough, it was ascertained that there was a list of defaulting paymasters in the Fourth Auditor's Office numbering no less than a hundred, not one of whom has ever been court-martialed, not one of whom has had action in the civil courts prosecuted against him to judgment. Some of these defalcations amount to several hundred thousand dollars, and in some instances the defaulter still remains in the service of the Government and is still intrusted with its funds. I submit the list of these defaulters:

List of paymasters in default.

Mr. Speaker, whenever it was found on the part of the committee that the testimony in any wise affected any officer of the Government, that officer was summoned, and the officer so summoned had an ample opportunity to examine and review the testimony affecting him; and if any officers of the Navy Department have failed to review the testimony and to answer any charges made against them, it is not the fault of the majority of the committee; it is due wholly to their own neglect, their own indisposition to attend to the matter, or to the want of ability on their part to meet the charges.

They have not only been informed that they were at liberty to present themselves and be sworn, but also that they might recall and at leisure cross-examine any witness who had been examined at any stage of this proceeding if they deemed such course necessary for their vindication. They cannot, therefore, with reason or propriety, condemn the methods of procedure.

It would have been an absolute impossibility for this committee to have discharged their duty to that body which commissioned them with this grave responsibility had they opened their doors to the curiosity-seekers and news-mongers of the whole country who would overcrowd the committee-room and seriously interfere with the dispatch of business. They could not have conducted this investigation to a successful issue had that course been pursued.

Besides, this investigation is no trial; any verdict we may find does not amount to a sentence; it in itself imposes no punishment. It is indeed strange that the honorable gentlemen who have written the minority report can state to this House and to the country in the presence of this vast mass of testimony, which irrefutably establishes so many acts of neglect, of omission and commission that amount to maladministration, that there is an utter absence of guilt in this Department, and that the Committee on Naval Affairs have thus far accomplished nothing.

We have shown where millions upon millions of dollars could have been saved to this Republic by proper vigilance and fidelity. We have shown that marines might have been employed instead of watchmen, thus cutting off the annual expenditure of half a million of dollars. We have shown that the absurd bureau system, which extends to the navy-yards of the country, making commandants the sport of their subordinates, could have been dispensed with, thereby saving another half million of dollars annually. We have shown that political corruption pervades every branch of that service; that the friends of candidates swarm in these navy-yards; that because of the demoralization that results to labor by means of the immense increase of the muster-roll the expenditure of more than a million of dollars annually is involved, and in consequence these poor laborers are brought to grief and suffering, while the people are outrageously taxed therefor.

The honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD,] when speaking in behalf of the minority report, stated boastingly that he would confine himself to the only violation of law that was charged against the Secretary of the Navy, the only offense which in the judgment of the majority report called for action on the part of the Committee on the Judiciary. I refer him and those who sympathize with him in his attitude to the majority report, to pages 143 and those following, where it will be found that no less than one dozen sections of law are referred to as having been violated with impunity from one year to another.

When anything is said about the existence of these corrupt practices, when we point to the facts that all this prostitution of the service for political ends is tolerated in every navy-yard throughout the country, we are told that these things have been from time immemorial; that they existed in the days of Buchanan. We are told that these practices are sanctioned by usage and justified by precedent. It is most true that all these errors have existed in the navy-yards for the last score of years. It is even quite true that what is designated in the majority report a Cattellism was one of the evils existing under the administration of Mr. Buchanan. The same wrong-doers who now obtrude themselves upon the presence of the country were then to be found; notably Mr. Swift, the dealer in live-oak, then paid 10 per cent. commission to Mr. Plits, the chairman of the democratic committee in the State of Pennsylvania. I condemn that wrong just as zealously and just as earnestly as though it had been committed under this Administration.

But the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DANFORD] declares that these evils are inseparable from our Government. That may be his opinion; that may be the opinion of the Administration party of this country. But honest men who are determined upon reform feel well assured that this or any other evil can find certain correction by purging and expelling from office the men who have disgraced the Republic and by holding offenders to rigid accountability.

Besides that, previous to the year 1867, so far as political abuses are concerned, there was no law prohibiting them in express terms. We can point in these matters now to violated statutes, and yet the gentleman from Ohio asks, what has been accomplished? Why, sir, villainy has been unmasked. The people who have been defeated in their choice have had their rightful Representatives re-instated in their seats upon this floor. In the language of a certain party platform, the public conscience has been quickened, and those whose wrongs, whose misdoings, whose violations of law have awakened this public conscience will have nothing to hope for next November but a condemnation by the people.

Mr. Speaker, I do not mean to be partisan in my observations. What I have said with reference to parties is simply in refutation of what has been urged on this floor by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DANFORD.] I say that, so far as I am concerned, I have a conscience void of offense before God and men in so far as the conduct of this investigation is concerned. I believe that every facility has been afforded to the parties whose character, whose integrity, whose reputation are involved in this inquiry. I believe it will be confessed on the part of the minority members of this committee that they have been allowed the same right to call and examine witnesses that has been enjoyed by the majority members of the committee.

Mr. Speaker, I think I have pointed out the practical results which have been attained by this investigation. In so far as the res gestæ of this report is concerned, I am in accord with it. In so far as certain questions affecting science, questions of a theoretical character are concerned, for instance the relative superiority of simple and compound engines, I might join issue with the majority members of the committee. But this is unnecessary at this time. We have shown clearly and beyond peradventure that millions upon millions of dollars can be saved to this Government by the enforcement of the reforms indicated in the majority report; by drying up the fruitful sources of plunder and extravagance whence the country has been deluged. In view of this fact, in view of the fact that it is necessary for something to be done that the people may understand their Representatives are able to meet their responsibilities, I trust this majority report will be adopted. It reflects all that is purest, noblest, and most patriotic in the Navy.

Mr. HALE obtained the floor and said: I yield for a moment to my friend from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON,] who wishes to submit a motion.

EVENING SESSION FOR DEBATE.

Mr. MORRISON. At the request of several gentlemen who want to make remarks on the bill to amend the laws relating to internal revenue, I ask unanimous consent that a recess be taken this afternoon, and that there be a session at eight o'clock this evening for debate only, no vote to be taken and no business to be done.

Mr. FOSTER. Let the session be for debate on any subject—general debate.

Mr. MORRISON. Certainly; I have no objection to that.

There being no objection, the proposition of Mr. MORRISON was agreed to.

NAVAL INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HALE. I rise, Mr. Speaker, to enter my earnest protest against this partisan attempt to break down an able and honest officer of the Government—to protest against this attempt to utilize the last days of a session preceding a presidential election by raising a new rallying cry for the canvass over alleged maladministration on the part of a man who seven years ago came to Washington bringing the highest reputation as a good lawyer and as an honest man, and who in all unprejudiced minds has maintained that reputation from that day to this; who found a shattered and decayed and almost useless Navy and who put in its place the best by far that the country has ever had; who has been at the head of a Department in which have been spent tens of millions of dollars and who has never directly or indirectly taken one dollar for himself, but who is to-day a poorer man than when seven years ago he resigned the attorney-generalship of New Jersey and came to Washington to be Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Speaker, in discussing this subject I have but little time to give to it, not half that I could wish. Of the hour that is assigned me I shall yield large portions to different gentlemen who have from time to time taken an interest in this investigation and who have to some extent explored the wide waste of testimony that the committee has thrown open to us. Something of this I have done myself. I have not read all of the testimony, and I propose to confine myself to certain portions of the investigation, the testimony bearing upon which I have faithfully gone through. Human life is too short to read everything that the committee has raked and scraped from the corners of the earth; and there is no tyranny yet so well established that it can oblige any member here to wade through the record of the spites, the hates, the disappointed ambitions, and the false evidence which this committee have gathered. But from time to time this winter, as the committee has chosen to dole out to the newspapers such fragments of testimony as in their wisdom they deemed advisable, I have followed it carefully; and since the report and the testimony have been made public I have given to portions of it upon which I wish to speak some of the time when I ought to have been abed and asleep; not, I am free to say, with the hope as I read on that I should derive that benefit in style which Macaulay advises the ingenious youth of England that he may expect if he gives his days and nights to Addison.

But I have read enough to know this, Mr. Speaker, that if anywhere this committee has found any ambitious officer in the Navy who believes in the exaltation of his Department into a realm where $10 will be spent where one is now spent, and who blames the Secretary because he has not scattered money with more lavish hand, it has opened its doors to him. I have read enough to see that if there has been any discharged officer or employé of the Government that has come to Washington or the various places where the committee has sat, trumpeting his tale of personal wrongs, the committee have reached out their arms and gladly received him. I have read enough to know that if there has been any baffled contractor who has not succeeded in getting his scheme for illicit gain through the Navy Department, and is now disturbed by the memory of profits that he never should have had and has lost, the committee has found him and gladly heard him. I have learned that if there has been living any old officer of the Navy who held important place before the rebellion, like Ex-Constructor Porter, who had been at Norfolk, who refitted the Merrimac and made her such an engine of destruction to our Navy that in the little space of an hour she sunk millions of dollars and most precious lives—I have learned that if the committee found any such as he, they opened their doors to him, and gave him welcome, and made him sit in all the high places that their report erects. They listened to and set down all his complaints, imbittered as they were by the reflection on his part of the day when, under the democratic party, he was a power in the Navy Department. I have learned that if throughout the length of the Atlantic coast there has been any "dead-beat" who has been kicked from the doors of the Navy Department, the committee has invited him and has taken his testimony, and that wherever, as in the case of the man Wolef, he has been contradicted by witness upon witness piling up contradiction, Ossa upon Pelion, the report of the committee has been made upon the testimony of the "dead-beat," and that nowhere in the report is to be found the countervailing testimony of the honest witnesses. So much I have learned by reading this report so far as I have been able to give time to it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I claim to know something of the American Navy and of its management and condition in the last seven years. In the Forty-first Congress I had the honor to serve upon the Naval Committee.

In the two succeeding Congresses I served upon the Committee on Appropriations. I had charge of all naval appropriations. Such experience ought to have given me some knowledge of the operations of the Department, some views as to the management of the Secretary of the Navy during these years.

And just here I wish to give about all my time to the consideration of the real condition of the American Navy as it now is in contrast with what it was when Mr. Robeson took charge of it, for the heaviest charge in the complaint of the majority of the committee is that the Secretary has wantonly and perhaps corruptly wasted the immense sums of money that have been put by Congress at his disposal, and that little or nothing can be shown for it; that there is presented in these seven years a wilderness of extravagance, corruption, and fraud. When the Secretary took the Department in 1869 he had everything to learn. He set himself to learn it. He inherited almost everything but a good Navy. He inherited a Department used to extravagant expenditures of money during all the years of the war. He has suffered with certain naval officers because his term of office has been at a time when Congress and the people demanded that there should be lessening of expenditure, a policy never acceptable with the officers of the Navy. He inherited a service the spirit of whose officers was high and who believed that the American Navy should be increased until it should compare with the navies of great European powers where a pound sterling is spent where we spend a dollar. Above all, Mr. Speaker, he inherited a Navy with ships which were ships only in name; their hulls were decayed, their engines were worthless. With many of them speed was a myth. With others to float even was as impossible as for a rich man to enter the kingdom of heaven.

There were at that time, Mr. Speaker, when the Secretary took charge of this Department, but eighteen ships in all that were suitable for sea-service. This fact the gentlemen who father this remarkable majority report either have not learned or have ignored entirely. But such is the fact. Out of all the expenditure of the war, the Navy having been run in that period like a race-horse to win a particular race at no matter what the future sacrifice should be, Mr. Robeson, when he came into office, had but eighteen ships fit for sea-service. We had never run so low since Mr. Jefferson's mania for little gunboats and a dismantled Navy. Now to-day there are eighty ships, including iron-clads in good condition and fit for service.

Here is a table showing the original cost of the iron-clads alone and the money expended upon each under the administration of the present Secretary:

IRON-CLADS.

Now, Mr. Speaker, of these eighty ships, forty-seven have been extensively repaired and rebuilt in the last five years. They have been built and repaired out of appropriations given by Congress to the Secretary. There is one thing which I have failed to see credit given for in this report to the Secretary of the Navy in which he stands alone, and that is, that in all these years, whatever the appropriations of Congress have been, he has confined himself rigidly to them. There have been no deficiency bills, Mr. Speaker, in the Secretary of the Navy's Department, and he has brought up this little dwindled Navy of eighteen vessels, out of the appropriations Congress has given him, to a navy of eighty good vessels, fit for sea and for defense.

And for this the gentlemen on the majority of the committee would impeach him for high crimes and misdemeanors.

What would they have done, I wonder, if the Secretary had supinely allowed the American Navy to go to destruction and had really nothing to show for his money?

One of the charges made is as to the rebuilding of vessels out of the appropriations for construction and repair. Yes, the Secretary has done it. He does not deny it. He is proud of it; and, as an advocate and friend of the American Navy, I am proud of it. He has built out of the appropriation for construction and repair ten vessels which are to-day as good as new.

But, while the committee have found that fact, they have not found the further fact that the Secretary has followed the example of every administration for thirty years. Do gentlemen know that there were built in this same way the United States in 1850, the Fulton in 1835, the Engineer in 1835, the Princeton in 1851, the Constitution in 1852, the Constellation in 1853, the Congress in 1840, the Macedonian in 1852, and the Franklin in 1854; built from keel inclusive upward, only retaining the old name, just as Secretary Robeson built the Marion, the Vandalia, the Swatara, the Galena, the Nipsic, and has almost finished the Miantonomoh, the Amphitrite, the Monadnock, the Terror, and the Puritan?

He followed in the beaten track of his predecessors. Nay, has this committee ever found out that there were built outright in 1843, without authority of Congress, from the general appropriations, the following new vessels, new in name as well as in keel and hull: the Portsmouth, the Germantown, the Albany, the Plymouth, the Saint Mary's, and the Jamestown? These were added to the lists of the Navy by the Administration in the year 1843. And because the Secretary has gone half as far as previous democratic administrations, the majority of this committee want to impeach him.

Let me call the attention of gentlemen to some of the results of this good conduct on the part of the Secretary in building up a good Navy, which I say to-day, and I say it on the responsibility of knowledge, is a better Navy than the Republic has ever had. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] has referred to the Virginius excitement. Has he learned that because the Secretary of the Navy then summoned to the waters of the Gulf a fleet so efficient Spain did not dare herself to enter into the conflict, war was averted? Does he know that at that time Spain herself had an armament there that was larger than any which Howe or St. Vincent ever commanded; larger than the fleet with which Nelson won his coronet at the Nile or with which he broke the power of France and Spain at Trafalgar; and that, immense as that armament was, as frowning and portentous as was the appearance in the sky at that time, the Secretary of the Navy, whom you now want to impeach, sent into the very teeth of the guns of the Spanish vessels a force so efficient that we were protected and that hundreds of millions of dollars and thousands of valuable lives were saved? Why, sir, we owed more at that time to the course of the Secretary of the Navy that war was averted than to any and everybody else, as good as the diplomacy of the time was.

The gentlemen of the majority, I see, in their report contrast this Navy unfavorably with the Navy at the close of Mr. Buchanan's administration, and they contrast the expenditures. Why, sir, the administration of Mr. Buchanan in its four years had annual appropriations for the Navy of from eleven to fourteen millions of dollars, appropriations that would buy more of material and labor than the corresponding appropriations in any of the years that Secretary Robeson has been the head of the Department. And yet, sir, when the war broke out the Navy was not in a condition to fire a gun in defense of the flag.

Let me call the attention of those three gentlemen, from Tennessee and Texas and Alabama, who have been foremost in the matter in arraigning the Secretary, to the possible results had Mr. Robeson's navy under his management been on the seas in 1861. Had his fourteen iron-clads been ready for service then as they are now, we would have had one stationed at Memphis, and there would not have been the condition of affairs in Tennessee that you saw there at that time. We would have had one in Galveston, and Texas would not have been so rampant as you, sir, [looking at Mr. MILLS,] helped to make it that year. We would have had one at Mobile, and Alabama would not have been so eager to go into secession. We would have had one or two at Norfolk, and others at Charleston and at Savannah and at Wilmington and at Baltimore, and the rebellion would have been throttled and these gentlemen that now want to impeach a Cabinet officer because he has made a good navy for the Republic would perhaps have never gained the reputation in the field that has sent them onto this floor. Or, if I may be more charitable, in the peaceful times that would have ensued these gentlemen from Alabama and Texas and Tennessee would have decorated this Chamber with their presence earlier than they now have.

Other results would have followed if we had had a Secretary like the present one in the years preceding the war. We would not have had so heavy a debt as we have now. There would not have been so many pensions. There would not have been such a war debt, and such a debt incidentally from the war. And my democratic friends would not have had so large a margin to figure from in making their reductions.

No, sir. The fact is that upon this subject the record of the Secretary of the Navy is resplendent with his achievements in building up this branch of the service. And the gentlemen of the majority of the committee have gone out delving in the highways and the byways and have found a canteen man at Brooklyn that took interest from the Navy, and they have found that a board was put into the Secretary's dumb-waiter and that a baptismal-font and a side-board were made, all of which the Secretary paid for at high prices out of his own money and henceforth got his furniture at cheaper prices; they have hunted up old constructor John Porter, who has filled their pages with his bitter complaints and talk about the enormities of the present administration in the navy-yards, and they complain that men at the navy-yards vote the republican ticket on compulsion.

As an illustration of this subject I ask that the following letter be read by the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMANDANT'S OFFICE, NAVY-YARD, MARE ISLAND,
September 23, 1858.

SIR: Mr. Turner, civil engineer, objects to a requisition for a sawyer to superintend the saw-mill without its going through his office, and further states that the saw-mill is under the immediate charge of the master joiner.

I have heard also that the man selected by you is a black republican; if so, he cannot be admitted on the rolls of this yard while I command it.

Respectfully, your obedient servant,

R. B. CUNNINGHAM, Commandant.

I. HANSCOM, Esq., Naval Constructor,
Navy-Yard, Mare Island, California.

Mr. HALE. That is better, Mr. Speaker, than any argument of mine. It shows that while abuses do exist in this direction, they have come down from former years.

Now as to abuses. If this committee had found that during all these years of expenditure of tens of millions of money there were irregularities, there were things to be cured, there were censures to be visited, and had manfully made the censures, had reported the statutes that should be changed to better the condition of the Department, had recommended for court-martial the officers that they found neglectful and guilty of maladministration, or had visited their direct censure wherever they had seen fit to visit it, there then would have been less fault to find. But, Mr. Speaker, it is plain to be seen that, with these gentlemen, the significant and picturesque effect that they wanted to hold before the country in the coming canvass was the fact that a Cabinet officer in the present Administration had either been impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors or that impeachment was hanging over his head. And so what should have been an honest investigation has had its currents turned away for partisan purposes.

Mr. Speaker, the method of this investigation that has been so well characterized has been such as to thwart all its purposes. Had this committee had a stern purpose to seek the facts and nothing but the facts, and to report the truth and nothing but the truth, it should at its first meeting have notified the Secretary of the Navy. It should have thrown open its doors to let in Heaven's sunlight, and should never have put the padlock of secrecy upon its doings and turned all into a star-chamber inquiry. An organized committee of the popular branch of the American Congress is no place to conduct proceedings in darkness and not to communicate to the country what it is doing. But it has been made the place of refuge for black-mailers, informers, and dead-beats. The good sense of the American people, whatever truth there may be in the final report, will look upon even it with suspicion, and herein the gentlemen of the majority of the committee have overdone their work, so that as a consequence it will come back to plague them.

Mr. Speaker, in what I have said I have dealt mainly with the condition of the American Navy, because that is at the bottom of the question. I say here, and I can maintain it, that the Secretary of the Navy has built out of the ordinary appropriations of the Republic the best Navy that the country has ever had, and for this the gentlemen of the majority of this report would forsooth impeach him!

Truly republics are ungrateful, and never more so when the question whether praise or blame shall be meted out rests with the majority of the present Committee on Naval Affairs.

I now yield fifteen minutes to my colleague, [Mr. FRYE.]

Mr. FRYE. I do not know that I need any excuse for addressing this House for fifteen minutes, and yet as I have no connection with the Naval Committee perhaps it is just for me to say that as a member of this House, as a lawyer, as a gentleman careful and sensitive as to the honor of the Secretary of the Navy, a gentleman whom I have known long, known well, and whom before this investigation commenced I believed to be a man of as strict integrity, of as noble purposes, of as generous impulses as any man within the circle of my acquaintance, I have studiously and critically examined this evidence, and I beg to say to the House from the examination I have made of the testimony, from the discussion which has taken place on the floor of this House, I state on my honor as a member that my opinion has not been changed as to the Secretary of the Navy one jot or one tittle. Sir, there are periods in the history of the world when darkness usurps the place of light, as the spots now and then appear upon the face of the moon; when justice is dethroned and tyranny is enthroned; when the possession of virtue, of purity, and integrity only lead to an attack and persecution upon the possessor; when suspicion secures conviction, while evidence fails; when father is against son and brother against brother; and the members of one's own household are spies upon him and his family; times when hell seems to reign and heaven to serve. History repeats itself, and if ever one of those dark periods of time was repeated in the history of the American Congress it has been during this present session. I dare say here that not one score of gentlemen can be found to-day on the floor of this House who if they knew that the history of this session was to be repeated would not declare that never again would they represent their constituency in the American Congress.

Why, sir, it has been bitter, it has been full of suspicion, it has been full of crimination and recrimination; all social intercourse has been imbittered by it, and why? Because a great party of the country, hungry and thirsty by an abstinence of a score of years, thought that it saw the flesh-pots of Egypt and was bound to taste thereof. Ah! gentlemen, you have gone too far; you may get a view of the promised land but you cut off your prospect of ever reaching it by too fond a desire for an indulgence in flesh-pots. Sir, why is it that scores of committees of this House for the last seven months, at a cost to the people of $3,000 a day, clothed with the power of sending for persons and papers, armed with subpœnas, sitting with closed doors, have sent these subpœnas into the slime and the alleys and the lanes of great cities; have brought in the drunkards, the insane men, the discharged employés, and disgraced officials, and everything that was debased and wicked, and, sitting with closed doors, have taken from their lips that filth they were willing and delighted to dispense, and from time to time have scattered it through a partisan press? Only because the necessities of the party seem to require it.

Why is it that the Naval Committee listen to the story of Porter, who as naval constructor at Norfolk fitted out the Merrimac, violated his oath, destroyed vessels sailing under the American flag, and finds false measurements of timber in that yard though a dozen loyal men flatly contradict him? The necessities of the party demand it.

Why is it that the testimony of the drunken Wolfe, the discharged employé, almost in delirium when he testified, is believed against the contradicting statements of five respectable and credible witnesses? The necessities of the party demand it.

Why is it that the Committee on the Real Estate Pool Ring was empowered by this House to investigate every man and everything under the wide heavens, and in pursuance of that purpose dared to violate the sanctity of private business letters and telegrams, to send to the vats of paper-makers and bring such telegrams here by the half ton and spend months sorting over this private correspondence of private gentlemen, disgracing themselves and outraging the American Congress? Ah! because the necessities of the party seemed to require it.

Why is it that a dignified committee like that on the judiciary is parceled out into squads of detectives, and, notwithstanding their dignity, compelled to prowl around among discharged employés of the Treasury Department, among disgraced officials, among whisky-ring convicts, seeking to prove that the great executive head of the United States too has been dabbling in whisky frauds? Why would that committee dare try to drag in the mire the great name of this great Republic before the eyes of the whole world? There is but one answer: The necessities of the party seemed to require it.

Why, when a member of this House was charged with selling a cadetship for $3,000, did the subcommittee of the judiciary spend months upon the case; and then when they found that there was not a scintilla of evidence against their colleague and their peer on the floor of this House, and were compelled to report his exculpation, why, I say, did they in six of the pages of that exculpation report seek to cover him with the infamy of gross and wicked suspicions; that report never signed or voted for by but four members of the committee, while the minority report which I now have in my desk, and which fully and completely exculpates the gentleman from Alabama, [Mr. HAYS,] is signed by five members of that committee?

Why did a man of dignity, of learning, of honesty, when a witness was before the Committee on the Judiciary, ask him, "What is the name of Mr. Hays?" "Charles." "Did you ever hear him called by any other name?" "No, sir." "Did you ever hear him named by some other name?" "No, sir." "Did you never hear Charles Hays called something else?" "No, sir;" seeking to call out the fact against a colleague on the floor of this House that partisan papers of the democratic party and the partisans themselves had labeled him "Ananias" Hays, because he had sent from the State of Alabama accounts of outrages committed there? Why would that gentleman descend to that when he never would dream of doing it in any court-house in this country? Ah! because the necessities of the party demanded it.

Why did the same committee demand the private correspondence of a distinguished member of this House, in no manner relating to the case in hand; and when it was refused, why did the partisan press fill the public mind with gross and wicked suspicion, until in self-defense that gentleman was compelled to read the letters to forty millions of people? The necessities of a great party demanded it.

And so I might go on by the hour, but I have only fifteen minutes. I now put the same question to the House and to the country as to this Committee on Naval Affairs. Why did you sit with closed doors for months, taking four thousand printed pages of testimony? Why did you close the mouths of the republican members of that committee, so that they could not make an inquiry to obtain information in relation to this examination? And when you had got through your taking of testimony, why did you make this report, for which there is no foundation in the evidence from its beginning down to its very end?

Why did the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. LEWIS] yesterday and why did the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] to-day assert what they did assert in regard to the Cattell performance, or the "Cattellism" as they termed it? Why did the gentleman from Texas assert that E. J. Cattell testified that he expended $13,000 for Secretary Robeson upon a palace at Long Branch, when the gentleman from Texas knew as well as I know, because I have read the testimony, that E. G. Cattell was acting as the agent of A. G. Cattell, an Ex-Senator of the United States, and then absent, by virtue of an agreement with him? And he knew further that the Secretary of the Navy had mortgaged or deeded property in the city of Washington of three times the value of the whole amount as security to A. G. Cattell & Co. for the advances which had been made. Why was the gentleman silent as to that? Ah! the necessities of the party demanded it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. FRYE. Why I have hardly commenced my speech.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] yielded ten minutes of his time.

Mr. HALE. I yield five minutes more.

Mr. FRYE. I thank my colleague. Why did the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MILLS] read the income returns of the Secretary of the Navy from 1866 to 1869, when he knew as well as I know it, but was silent about it, that the Secretary of the Navy in 1866 paid an income tax on $76,000, a tax of over $7,000, and which the gentleman from Texas knew would be allowed the next year to the payer of the tax, and deducted from the tax of that year? Why did he make these statements when the Secretary of the Navy himself testified uncontradicted that he had been compelled to sell $20,000 of United States bonds to keep up his position here in the city of Washington, and that all he was worth to-day more than he was worth the day he became Secretary of the Navy came from rise in property? Why did he not say, as is proven in the case, that the account-books of A. G. Cattell & Co. contained every item charged against Mr. Robeson?

Now what is it about the Cattells? A. G. Cattell, Ex-United States Senator, was for twenty years the friend of the Secretary of the Navy. The Secretary of the Navy was the attorney and counsel for A. G. Cattell & Co. for ten years before he became the Secretary of the Navy; hence all these business transactions between them. Now I submit to this House—for I have not time to examine the evidence, and I ask them to examine this testimony for themselves—that they cannot find one scintilla of evidence from the beginning to the end of it which connects the Secretary of the Navy in the remotest degree either with selling his influence to contractors or with receiving one dollar of benefit from them.

On the contrary, it will be found that the Secretary of the Navy himself testified before the committee that he never received one dollar from any contractor or for any contract; that when he heard by public rumor that E. G. Cattell was endeavoring to sell his influence with the Department, he, the Secretary of the Navy, immediately went to Philadelphia and informed the party in charge there that no such thing would be allowed for a moment. E. G. Cattell testified that the Secretary was kept in profound ignorance of the facts, as was his brother, A. G. Cattell, so far as it could be done.

Roache and other contractors, two in number, testified that the Secretary of the Navy told them that under no circumstances should they pay a dollar or a cent to E. G. Cattell or any other man in order to procure contracts; that if he knew of their doing it the contracts would not be granted. Where is the evidence that the Secretary was knowing to this commission business? There is not one word in the whole four thousand pages of testimony.

Then, again, the Secretary himself testifies distinctly and squarely that he never extended favor to E. G. Cattell or to any other contractor or to any other purchaser of supplies whatsoever; and I have here a list of twenty-three leading officers of the Navy whom he called as witnesses, all of them having served from twenty-five to forty-five years and every one of them having been in positions as commissaries, quartermasters, &c., where they had the right legally to purchase supplies for periods covering the whole time that Mr. Robeson has been Secretary of the Navy, and every one of them to a man testifies that there never was any request for favor on the part of the Secretary of the Navy; that there never was any favor extended by them; that he never, directly or indirectly, asked them to extend favor to any living contractor or furnishing man. Why does the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS,] why do the majority of the Naval Committee disregard all this testimony and in their report never mention it at all, but go entirely upon suspicions of their own? The necessities of the party demand it.

"O," it is said, "the Secretary of the Navy must have got money improperly, because this Cattell sold his influence." Gentlemen, do you not know that your influence and your votes are sold every day that you sit on the floor of this House? Do you not know that brokers and lobbyists in Washington and New York are selling the votes of the very best of you every day that you live? Do you not know that they sold the vote of Hon. William Pitt Fessenden for a thousand dollars—a man who could not be corrupted by all the money in the world; whose ever-enduring monument is that he dared to stand up in the impeachment trial of Andrew Johnson and vote "not guilty" against his whole party? And yet, do you dare assume that he was corrupt? Do you assume that Congress is corrupt? Do you assume that the chairman of this committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, is corrupt because some miserable scoundrel sells influence with him that he never had, and his vote which he could never control? E. G. Cattell did this, and nothing more than this; yet the majority of the Naval Committee find that Mr. Robeson is corrupt because Cattell is a scoundrel!

Mr. HALE. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. KELLEY.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Speaker, I grieve as sincerely as any man in this House over the character of this report. It is a sad disappointment to me. There are abuses, traditional abuses, in many departments of the Government; and I hoped that we should get a calm, philosophic arraignment of these and proposed amendments in the law which would remedy and avert them. But this report is so superficial and bitterly partisan that it must be a disappointment to the whole country. It brings forward no amendments to the law; it proposes to remedy no evil; but in lieu of such practical suggestions it proposes to refer to another committee of the House a mass of four thousand pages of loose and incoherent testimony, much of it from disreputable sources, in order that that committee may discover whether George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy, has been guilty of any crime or misdemeanor. Stultifying itself, the Naval Committee in this proposition declares that in seven months it has not been able to discover such a fact, and asks that the Judiciary Committee may sit at least till after the November election upon the question and ascertain whether it can discover any in this mass of worse than hearsay evidence.

I have known Mr. Robeson, in the little city in which he grew to manhood and has practiced law, for more than a quarter of a century, and I aver that in an inquisition made in open daylight, where the safeguards of character established by tradition, law, or decency should be respected, the world may investigate him, and his integrity will come out without taint or tarnish. What, with strumpets and thieves and their consorts examined in the darkness, sworn not to reveal what they had testified to, with even the minority of the committee bound to the secrecy of the Spanish inquisition, what taint you may have put upon the name of an honorable man, I know not; but when the American people know your methods and look at your flimsy partisan results, they will discard your report as I do, as a mere electioneering document made at the expense of the character of our country and institutions.

Sir, there are, as I have said, traditional abuses to be remedied. And I affirm without fear of successful contradiction that the republican party has done more in fifteen years to prevent such abuses than the democratic party had in its whole protracted career. In former years appropriations were made in the lump and divided by the Departments. They are now not only made in detail to Departments but in similar detail to Bureaus, and they go into the Treasury for each specific Bureau, and may not be transferred from one to another. Sir, you have doubtless heard the well-founded tradition that in earlier times the Speaker's pay was always enlarged by an appropriation from the contingent fund of the House, which never was subject to revision by any committee or other authority. To whom went the surplus stationery when stationery was a perquisite of members? Why, if members left any, it went to the Speaker unaccounted for. Read the story of the Public Printer in the testimony taken by the Covode Committee in 1860 in broad daylight, when the accused was permitted to be present. Read the testimony of Cornelius Wendell, Public Printer, and you will find that there was a reason why it often took from three to six weeks to elect a Public Printer. It was because the profits of the office had to be apportioned before the democratic caucus would determine who was to be elected. Mr. Wendell's testimony exhibits a part of what he paid for his election and shows that some of it got over the threshold of the White House when James Buchanan was President.

I, too, have investigated a bureau of the Navy Department. The present Administration came in with the Navy Department as organized under Andrew Johnson; and I had a committee raised to investigate the purchase of machinery.

We held our sessions in daylight. Every man who was impugned was invited to be present while the witnesses were testifying against him and to examine them. They were all heard before representatives of the press and the people. Those were old-fashioned days when the accused was presumed to be innocent till his guilt was established, and when, being accused, every man had the right to meet his accusers face to face in person or by counsel. And the records of the Senate will show that the first nominations made by President Grant were of successors to the men whom that investigation inculpated, and every one of them was relieved from duty at the earliest possible day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. KELLEY. I should like to have said a few words more.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has still five minutes left.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman from Maine permits me to go on. In 1854 or 1855 a democratic Congress ordered two sloops of war to be built in the navy-yard at Philadelphia, and I do but cite the statement of a southern member when vindicating the rebellion and denouncing the faithlessness of the northern democracy when I say they were built in order to re-elect Colonel Thomas B. Florence, then a member from the first district, whom he denounced as a democratic vagabond, and to secure the State of Pennsylvania for the democracy. That was for the election of 1856. I do not remember the year the appropriation was made, but it was 1854 or 1855, I think.

I deprecate as much as any man can do the employment of men in navy-yards or other public departments for political purposes. There is nothing in which I will give more cordial support to the administration of President Hayes than his promised civil-service reform. I am no novitiate in that school. In a letter addressed to my constituents on the 8th of March, 1870, in reply to one inviting me again to be a candidate, I said:

> If, therefore, the acceptance of a renomination is to be understood as implying a willingness on my part to be regarded as an employment agent I must beg leave to decline the honor, grateful as I would be to receive it freed from this condition, tendered in so complimentary a manner.

They put into the platform a release from all that kind of work. I had hoped this committee would give us a report on that subject, or any other evil, which would lead to the adoption of a remedy. In this we have all been disappointed; for, as has been said, with partisan greed for power animating their every move, and hastening incompetent men, whom they themselves had to remove, into many of the places about this House, the committee satisfies itself with denouncing usages that have come down to us traditionally from the democratic party. Those sloops were built in order that men from many of the counties of Pennsylvania might be put on pay-rolls, in order that, although they did no work, they could get daily pay until after the November election. We have inherited that evil, and we are endeavoring to restrain it as we have others. From the pure censure might justly come to us, but not from those whose smirched and nasty garments have been cast upon our shoulders.

Mr. BANKS. A letter has been sent me by Mr. Watmough, Acting Paymaster of the Navy, which he desired I should present to the House. It will occupy but two or three minutes, and I ask unanimous consent to have it read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maine has two or three minutes left.

Mr. HALE. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts for the purpose he indicates.

Mr. BANKS. I ask the letter be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, BUREAU OF PROVISIONS AND CLOTHING,
Washington, D. C., July 28, 1876.

DEAR SIR: I saw last evening with astonishment the statement of the majority committee regarding my Bureau. I had placed in the hands of Mr. WHITTHORNE and Mr. HARRIS a clear explanation of the whole of the transaction in relation to the deficiency of $1,000,000 clothing-fund, and of course expected to have justice done me. I here append statement in regard to funds named, marked A, B, C, and must beg that in the House to-day attention will be called to these facts by the friends of the Bureau and of the Department. If not done, I shall feel myself compelled at once to publish a card in all the papers, containing the whole statement of expenditures in my Bureau since I came there; such a course being necessary to the vindication of my own honor and integrity.

I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JAS. H. WATMOUGH,
Acting Paymaster-General United States Navy.

Hon. N. P. BANKS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I desire only to say now that when I shall occupy the floor I will show that that report has been canvassed by the majority of the committee.

Mr. WILLIS. It forms part of the report.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. Certainly it does.

Mr. BANKS. I now ask that the other papers be read accompanying the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE,
July 29, 1876.

SIR: In response to your letter of the 29th instant, addressed to the Treasurer of the United States, I have to state that on the 10th of March, 1870, there was transferred from the appropriation "clothing for the Navy" to the surplus fund $700,000, and on June 30, 1870, the sum of $300,000, from the same appropriation, to the surplus fund.

Very respectfully,

STEPHEN J. W. TABOR,
Auditor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, in closing this debate on behalf of the minority of the Committee on Naval Affairs I shall endeavor to confine myself to those subjects which the majority bring to our attention as the result and conclusions of their investigation.

For seven months we have pursued as industriously, and with as much persistency and intensity as any committee of this House, I think, ever did, the investigation professedly into the general affairs of the Navy Department of this country, into its personnel and its material, under a resolution which required of us that we should report what measures were required to correct any abuses in the administration of naval affairs or errors in the law governing the subject of the Navy. At every stage of this investigation—from the first time the doors of the committee were opened to receive a witness until they were finally closed in the face of the minority of the committee before a report was made—we have been told this was not an investigation into conduct and character of any individual in particular, but an investigation for the purpose of bringing forward measures of reform, an investigation taking within its scope the result of systems rather than the action of the Secretary of the Navy alone, in order to bring him to the bar of the Senate under articles of impeachment.

I have always protested that the purpose and the apparent attempt of our committee was to hunt up if possible some ground upon which to make a charge against the Secretary of the Navy. I have felt so, Mr. Speaker. I have believed so. And now at last the result of all which comes before this House of Representatives, the result of all our investigations which this House is called to pass upon, is this: Is this House able to say as the result of this investigation that there are grounds for impeaching the Secretary of the Navy? Not exactly that, Mr. Speaker. The proposition is: Will this House send to another committee of this body this vast accumulation of trash called testimony and the conundrums which the committee seem to raise upon questions of law? Shall we send all this to another great committee of this House to find out whether possibly there may not be discovered from all this testimony a legal or technical ground upon which to charge the Secretary with high crimes and misdemeanors and to render it proper that articles of impeachment should be brought in here?

Mr. Speaker, whatever else there may be in this report, that is the question presented to this House to-day. It is the question for us now to pass upon. Now I will not stand here as a republican member of this House and a republican member of this committee and declare or permit any man to infer that I have not found in the course of this investigation grounds for charges, direct and specific, which I can point out, and which I could ask the House and the country or any legally constituted tribunal to pass upon. There are offenses; there are irregularities; there are peculations; there is fraud in the administration of a great Department like that of the Navy. There always were, and when we remember the infirmities of men, we may say there always will be. And yet it was our duty as a committee to point out to the House the men who committed these crimes and these frauds, to point them out by name, and designate the testimony upon which they might be convicted in any proper tribunal having charge of those matters.

I will not excuse the unjust and improper employment of a single man in any navy-yard in this country by any officer. Those things do happen. They have happened. The city of Boston, the city of Charlestown in my own State, have been disgraced in times past by both parties in the employment of men in the navy-yard; and it meets my utter condemnation.

But, sir, the committee content themselves now with saying generally that whenever the proof will establish the fact that officers of the Navy have committed crimes they should be punished by court-martial. There is no list of such officers. There are no names given to the country. We are left to infer. Such is the substance of the report of the committee upon the general question of frauds as applicable to other people, other than the Secretary of the Navy.

The question before us is: Shall the Secretary of the Navy be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors upon the evidence which this committee has gathered together, and which it now produces and lays before the country.

Mr. Speaker, when the committee itself, organized as it has been, controlled as it has been, wielded as it has been in the direction of impeachment, makes the report it does, it is a humiliating confession, I think, for the majority to say that we, a committee organized for the purpose, composed of gentlemen of learning, of legal education, and of great experience—we, before the House and before the country, confess that we cannot determine the question and ask you to send it over to the Committee on the Judiciary. Learned as that committee is, Mr. Speaker, I do not consent that the committee to which I belong shall confess before the country that upon a question of this kind it is not as competent and as able as any other committee of this House to pass upon this subject.

Just here I want to pause to say one word in answer to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. MILLS.] I do not admit; knowing myself, I think I will never admit that this investigation has been fair, impartial, and just. My own lips, Mr. Speaker, notwithstanding the remark that he lets drop from his—my lips were sealed for five months, so that in the presence of the Secretary of the Navy I considered that it would be dishonorable in me to mention any fact concerning our investigation. And when the gentleman says the Secretary had friends upon the committee who communicated with him, I think he does us great injustice. For myself I did not enter the Navy Department for weeks lest I should be thought to have had intercourse with the Secretary of the Navy. A seal was placed upon my lips by the majority. Although I resisted having it put there to the best of my ability, when there I obeyed. And I think the chairman of the committee will do me the justice to say, that so far as he has observed I kept the obligations imposed upon me.

But, sir, what is the use of talking about a fair investigation when the man and the men most affected can only know what transpired in the tribunal which was trying them after the press of the country had put it before them? Remember, Mr. Speaker, the investigation at Norfolk, the investigation at the Washington navy-yard, the investigations at the Philadelphia navy-yard, at New York, at Boston, and at Kittery were all completed and the summer had come upon us before the Secretary was allowed to put his foot in the committee-room. It was not, sir, until the 1st day of June that he came there. And then, as we have said in our report, he demanded that as a right which the committee had denied him for so long. When, sir, any man holding the relation which he holds to the Government is to be put on trial for high crimes and misdemeanors, it would seem to be a part of his right at least to meet face to face and to put the test of cross-examination to those witnesses who were brought to impeach his honor and his integrity.

And yet, sir, the report of this committee stands upon the testimony of a class of witnesses who were never cross-examined; their private history was unknown; their motives were unknown. While as is said there were friends of the Secretary of the Navy on the committee, friends rather of justice and fair play, we knew nothing of the private transactions of the Secretary of the Navy and we knew nothing of the secret transactions of the Department, and hence we were unable to make an intelligent cross-examination of these witnesses. I think the House will see that it is an imposition, a slander upon justice, to say that such an investigation can be fair. It is utterly impossible, however much the parties conducting it intended to make it so, that it should have been fair or impartial.

But my time is rapidly wasting, and I want to call the attention of the House to the question before it directly. That question is, Can the Secretary of the Navy be impeached; can the Committee on the Judiciary find cause to impeach him for violation of the law which the committee set forth in their indictments? They say that the Secretary has willingly and corruptly violated certain laws and that for the violation of those laws he ought to be impeached. Now, Mr. Speaker, a great officer like the Secretary of the Navy must necessarily be allowed to construe the law where it has not already been construed for him. He who undertakes to discharge the great trust confided to him must himself construe the law. If, on the other hand, there is a question as to what the law is, he may go to precedents and to history for a guide; but if he makes an honest attempt to execute the law as he understands it, he cannot be impeached, thank heaven, in this country at least, even if he errs in his conclusions. Were it otherwise, every judge upon the bench might be impeached for some wrong interpretation of the law; and the Secretary of the Navy has the right to ascertain from the statute what the law is and what are his duties under the law; and, if he honestly endeavors to execute the laws as he understands them, he cannot be impeached.

Here is the law which he is charged with violating:

> All claims and demands whatever by the United States or against them, and all accounts whatever in which the United States are concerned, either as debtors or as creditors, shall be settled and adjusted in the Department of the Treasury.

It is said that the Secretary of the Navy violated that law in that he paid a certain claim known as the Hungerford claim.

Mr. Speaker, the Hungerford claim was adjusted and settled in the Department of the Secretary of the Treasury. How could the money ever be paid out except that it was adjusted there. There is an absolute and complete compliance with the law, and if the Secretary of the Navy unlawfully passed the claim, it was passed by the Secretary of the Treasury; it was settled or it would not have been paid.

But what of the Hungerford claim? Mr. Hungerford owned a large establishment upon the Mississippi River during the war which was taken from him by the forces of the United States. The value of the property was said to amount to $230,000. A portion of the materials from that establishment was transferred by the Naval Department to Mound City for the establishment of a naval rendezvous.

Mr. Hungerford never received a dollar for that property then taken, and a portion of it was a claim against the Navy Department. Whatever else this committee may say, they will not undertake to say that that was not an honest debt against the Government of the United States. After examination by the Department the Secretary of the Navy determined that it was his right to pay for these things which the Navy Department had used, and he ordered the payment of $75,000.

Now I suppose that gentlemen will admit that when the Government takes from a loyal citizen his property it takes it leaving behind an implied promise to pay for it. When the Government took this property from Mr. Hungerford, he being a loyal citizen, they did it with an implied promise to pay for it. If in this particular case any violation of law has taken place, who will find fault about it and say that the Secretary of the Navy shall be impeached? It is said that a portion of this money went to a broker in Washington. That is true. A certain man did receive this money and handed $40,000 of it to the client and pocketed the rest. Undoubtedly that was a great act of injustice. Mr. Hungerford has been paid this $75,000, but there is some money yet due him. A certain lawyer in Washington came before the committee and complained that the Secretary of the Navy would not re-open the case and pay the balance due. The Secretary of the Navy brought forward a receipt in full for the whole claim. The Secretary of the Navy has been abused because he would not re-open that claim and pay the balance, and we had before our committee witnesses after witnesses charging the Secretary with wrong and injustice because he would not re-open that claim and pay more upon it. These witnesses were not brought in the committee-room by any members of the minority of the committee. If you turn to the law which established the Court of Claims, you will find that each Department has a right to send to the Court of Claims such claims as it may deem necessary; but even here in the law the word "may" is attached, indicating that the heads of the Departments may also settle and adjust the honest claims against the Department to the extent of the appropriation made for that Department.

I come now to the next item in the so-called indictment. By section 1538 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that "no more than $3,000 shall be expended in any navy-yard in repairing the hull and spars of any vessel until the necessity and expediency of such repairs and the probable cost thereof are ascertained and reported to the Navy Department by an examining board." One of the grave accusations made against the Secretary of the Navy is that he has rebuilt the Navy without reference to that law.

I also desire to call the attention of the House to the facts that while the Secretary of the Navy is denounced in this report for having brought into the Navy ships unlawfully and in violation of that law, he has also been guilty of suffering the American Navy to go to decay.

Will the American public hold him guilty of crime in rebuilding its decaying Navy and, as the committee does, denounce him for not having a larger Navy? I think not.

The Secretary of the Navy claims that in 1862, or thereabouts, I do not remember the exact time, for the purpose of preventing the improper and improvident building and repair of vessels in the navy-yards of the United States by the commandants and other officials in charge, Congress was appealed to to prevent such expenditures without express authority of the Navy Department. It is claimed by the Secretary of the Navy that under that action of Congress no officers of a navy-yard would have authority to spend more than $3,000. But he denies, and I appeal to the House to say whether that denial is not well founded, that Congress intended to limit the power of the President of the United States to make and maintain a navy for the country.

The President of the United States gives the authority to the Secretary of the Navy; the Secretary is but the hands of the President. The President is clothed with all the power over the Navy; he is the Commander-in-Chief of the armies and navies of the United States. By section 417 of the Revised Statutes it is provided that—

> The Secretary of the Navy shall execute such orders as he shall receive from the President relative to the procurement of naval stores and materials, and the construction, armament, equipment, and employment of vessels of war, as well as of other matters connected with the naval establishment.

Says the Secretary of the Navy, "Would you say to me that I, when well informed and knowing all the facts, must resort to the absurd farce of asking a few officers in a navy-yard to appraise a vessel which I have determined to rebuild? Are my powers as Secretary of the Navy thus limited and thus circumscribed? Is the power of the President of the United States thus limited and circumscribed? No!" And I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in support of that construction the Secretary of the Navy may appeal to the whole history of the American Navy.

I do not propose to make any partisan speech at this time or to participate in any partisan attack. But for the construction of that law and the powers of the Secretary of the Navy I appeal to the glories of the past, to the history of the country, and the construction given to it by men of the ablest minds and of the greatest purity of character.

Says the Secretary of the Navy, "Have I, from April, 1869, to 1876, been so circumscribed that when I deem it to the interest of the country I could not repair a ship without asking some subordinate officer what it will cost?" I claim, Mr. Speaker, that the Secretary of the Navy violated no law, whatever construction you may put upon that statute, when he did what the committee have charged upon him.

What has he done? Let me call attention for a moment to the first report made by him soon after he entered upon his official duties. On page 12 of that report he says:

> Yet we have not at this time on any foreign station a squadron whose combined force would avail for a day against the powerful sea-going iron-clads which both France and England have upon such stations. These are not agreeable facts for contemplation or to state; but after giving the subject much investigation and reflection I have felt it my duty to state the truth frankly to you.

He did so to the representatives of the people that they might determine how much and how prompt action the situation required. When entering upon the duties of his office he announced to the public—he humiliated the great American Republic in the eyes of the world, if you please, by the announcement that we had no vessels fit to meet the vessels of the powers of Europe, and he appealed to Congress for authority to put upon the seas vessels of a character which might preserve and maintain the American power and the American honor.

And mark it, from that hour until this, Congress has not passed a law, has not made an appropriation to build a ship of war of the class here referred to. The only appropriation which the honorable Secretary of the Navy has had at his command, given to him by Congress, was an appropriation of about $4,000,000 to build eight sloops of war of not more than nine hundred tons burden each and two torpedo-boats. And yet, in the face of this a great committee of the House of Representatives can come now and say to the people of the country, "Behold! the Secretary of the Navy has suffered our fleet to go to decay and our honor to be tarnished in that he has neglected to put upon the seas ships of war equal to those of the other great naval powers of the world."

Now what are the facts? It is attempted to be stated in this report that great waste has been made. The committee cite Admiral Porter's statement that $18,200,000 per annum has been in the hands of the Secretary of the Navy for yards and docks, reconstruction, ordnance, and steam-machinery. Why, sir, the whole appropriations for these purposes has been but a little over $8,000,000 a year. Out of those $8,000,000 a year the Secretary of the Navy has had to pay all the great expenses of yards and docks, to provide ordnance, construction, repairs, and steam-machinery. The Secretary has had at his command for all these purposes but a little over eight and a half millions a year, even taking the highest figures given in the majority report.

And what has he done? I will not refer to it in detail, for I have not time; but I will refer to the fact that he has rebuilt fifteen iron-clads, which, when he came into office, could not float or fire a gun; they have been brought into good fighting condition. What else has he done? There were our great double-turreted monitors, built of white oak, and therefore going rapidly to decay, and had to be abandoned or repaired.

What has he seen fit to do? He has seen fit to take from the annual appropriations for constructions and repairs—nobody will deny it; it has been taken directly from the appropriations for constructions and repairs—he has seen fit to take money from this source and save those vessels from going out of the Navy and out of the service, by putting into them new frames of live oak and rebuilding their decks of iron. They are not now complete; but Admiral Porter, who is always cited by the committee when he criticises the Department of the Navy, says that that was a wise measure; that otherwise those vessels would have been lost to the service. He has put in good condition all the vessels of the Navy, with the exception of fourteen; and he has done it out of the appropriations for construction and repairs, for yards and docks, for ordinance and for steam-engineering, amounting to the sum I have stated; and any other statement, by whomsoever made, is utterly without foundation, as I understand the testimony.

But the complaint is made that the Secretary of the Navy has rebuilt ships. Will any gentleman on this floor tell me how can you repair a ship of white-oak frame if your frame is rotten? How can you repair an iron-clad monitor with a white-oak frame unless you begin at the keel and build her up with live oak? That is what the Secretary of the Navy has done with reference to these great monitors and other valuable ships.

Why, sir, when we were at New York pursuing our investigations we went over to the navy-yard and spent a day or two there and among other things we visited the great iron-clad Colossus, built upon the docks, and standing in the navy-yard there—commenced at the close of the war and intended to be one of the largest and most formidable ships of the Navy. She was kept sheltered in a large ship-house; and she stands there to-day as the workmen left her. She was a white-oak ship; a few planks had been stripped from her sides a few weeks before we were there, and with my own fingers I picked out from her white-oak frame a large piece of timber which I have here and which any gentleman may examine. It will be found utterly rotten. That ship was rotten from stem to stern; yet upon her exterior she looked fair and sound. Now, if that ship had been at sea how would you have repaired her? Simply by putting in a live-oak frame and upon that frame rebuilding all her parts. This is what the Secretary of the Navy has done to many of the vessels which otherwise would have been as useless as the unfinished Colossus, which is now of so little value that it is doubtful whether her destruction and removal could be paid for from the iron and copper which entered into her construction. Yet it is said that in doing this he has violated the statute to which I have referred, and for doing it he should be impeached for high crimes and misdemeanors. Mr. Speaker, the American people will not so look at this subject. The American people will call upon Congress and ask, "Why have you not provided the means for first-class ships of war of great power of guns, of great speed, of great capacity, fit to meet the navies of other powers?" Before the Secretary of the Navy is charged with fault I think the people will call upon Congress for an explanation. Rear-Admiral Jenkins, whose testimony is very copiously cited by the majority on this subject, says:

> The subject, however, is at best a very difficult and delicate one for a Secretary of the Navy to consider and decide upon its merits when viewed from every point. Surveys are not always good authority upon which to found a judgment. The surveyors themselves are not able as a rule to arrive at nearer than a merely approximative estimate of cost of materials and labor. There are, too, in many cases, many circumstances which must necessarily exercise a great, if not a preponderating, influence in deciding such questions. The report of the surveying officers, the pressing needs of the service for vessels for immediate use, the name, history, and past naval associations of the particular vessel, &c., must all be taken into account. The names of certain historical vessels of war are dear to the Navy and to the whole country. Neither the Navy nor the country could well afford to lose from the Navy list such names as the Constitution, Constellation, United States, Cyane, Levant, Guerrière, Java, Wasp, Frolic, Hartford, Marion, Kearsarge, Adams, Enterprise, Essex, Dale, &c. Whether it would be wiser for Congress to require special estimates, upon which to base special appropriations for rebuilding certain vessels by name, or by any name or names, to be determined and embraced in the act making the appropriation for rebuilding a vessel or vessels, or to leave it to the discretion and judgment of the Secretary of the Navy for the time being to rebuild them from the annual appropriations for general repairs of vessels, is a question about which there would doubtless be a great diversity of very honest opinion. Large sums voted in gross for general purposes, like repairs to vessels, although under one head, are liable to be diverted or misapplied, either from design or from want of sound judgment and good administration. The head of a great Department of the Government like that of the Navy cannot, with a proper regard to the true interests of that branch of the public service confided to him, be with safety too much hampered and trammeled in the execution of the great trusts confided to him; but rather he should be given the necessary discretion in details, and hold him to a strict account for any departure from a line of safe precedents.

But, sir, the Secretary is charged with crime in having bartered and exchanged certain material; and it is claimed also that, having bartered and exchanged this material, he has not made returns according to law; that in this he has violated the law and is liable to impeachment. This is the construction put upon the matter by the committee. What are the facts? Everywhere throughout the report, everywhere throughout the testimony it will be observed that the subject of barter and exchange on the part of the Secretary of the Navy makes a prominent figure. What is the matter of barter and exchange? Why, sir, the Secretary of the Navy has undertaken to rebuild certain iron-clads, and in rebuilding them large quantities of iron became necessary. Under the law he is authorized to sell such vessels as are not valuable and such material as in his judgment cannot be used. Now, Mr. Speaker, old iron taken from ships of war had accumulated in the scrap heaps of the Navy Department. Every person in this House must recognize the fact that large quantities must thus have accumulated at the close of the war and since. The Secretary saw fit to make a contract with John Roach, one of the largest, and, for aught I know, one of the most respectable ship-builders in the country—standing I believe at the head of the great manufacturers of ships—the Secretary of the Navy made a contract with him and other similar manufacturers to take the old iron of the Government in all forms and shapes—old beams, old chains, old plates—everything which the Government had to dispose of, to take this old iron to their manufactories and reroll it into forms adapted to the new iron-clads, delivering to the Government new iron suitable for the wants of the naval constructors, at the rate of one pound of new iron for three pounds of old.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am not sufficiently familiar with the subject to be able to say whether this was a good trade, a sharp bargain, or not; but its purpose was to utilize that material belonging to the Navy Department which could be easily utilized in the rebuilding of iron-clads.

But it is said this is a sale; that in point of fact it is a sale, and the Secretary of the Navy has violated the law which provides that he shall sell at public sale such material. It is barter of material, and therefore a sale, and the Secretary of the Navy has violated the law.

I might spend some time in discussing this question, but I submit to the House if the Secretary of the Navy has the right to rework a pound of old material he must do it at least at a sacrifice; and if he cannot do it in the Government navy-yard, he must find some one who can do it. And the Government of the United States, to its shame be it said, has neglected the recommendation of the Secretary of the Navy made to a former Congress, and it has no establishment in the country of sufficient power and with sufficient machinery to rework into larger sizes its old material. The Secretary of the Navy has therefore seen fit to re-appropriate it in this way. Shall he be held for crime and violation of law in doing this act?

But it is said he violated the law in not making returns of this old iron. The answer is he has sold none. It is further said that this old iron cost $20,000,000, and that therefore this is a great outrage. Yet the Secretary of the Navy and the heads of the Department have laid before the committee evidence uncontradicted that its whole value was less than $1,000,000 in market the day he put his hand to it to rework it and reroll it. Twenty millions of dollars it cost—confessedly more than that. During the war of the Revolution it cost many more millions than that, and he will be a better mathematician than I shall give the chairman of the committee credit for to show what it cost this country to originally get up this material now being reworked into iron-clads; it was a part of the cost of saving the country. Yet it is only old iron now worth one and a half cents per pound. It is said there has been misappropriation of funds. That charge I deny. I here inquire where in the whole scope of the testimony can be found the fact that one dollar of appropriation has been permanently taken from its proper Bureau and given to another? Except one—where?

Why, my friends on the other side do not give the Secretary of the Navy credit for any honesty. They treat him as a knave and a scoundrel. He does not seem to have any showing or standing. Nothing excuses him. No noble act, no heroic act, no act showing his love for the flag and the country protects him against the evidence of witnesses who have been before the committee. Nothing of the sort seems to protect him against the findings of this committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there was early in our investigation developed the fact that the pay of the Navy was sometimes indebted to the clothing of the Navy; and immediately there was a question on that. Why, here there is misappropriation of funds! Here is a great wrong! I thought so, Mr. Speaker; I did not know enough of naval affairs to see how that all happened. Let me explain. When a ship goes to sea on a foreign voyage, she takes with her sufficient clothing for her men. Every dollar of clothing given to American seamen is charged. When he receives his pay at the end of the month, or six months, all the clothing he has had is charged to him, and that is so much gain on the pay account. After months and months of service abroad they bring home the account. What must be done? What can the Secretary of the Navy do? He can simply have the accounts of pay and clothing sent to the Treasury. There, and not in the office of the Secretary of the Navy, the accounts are settled. The Treasury of the United States transfers from the pay to the clothing in the Navy the just balance which is due it.

There is nothing else of misappropriation except one. In the fall of 1873, $4,000,000 having been previously appropriated for eight sloops of war of light draught and small size, the Virginius excitement came upon the country, and the Secretary of the Navy spent all his appropriation to get the Navy into a condition of defense. He came before the succeeding Congress and declared the fact, declared it to the country, declared it to the world, and asked the Congress of the United States to approve his conduct in that respect, and it responded with an appropriation of $4,000,000. And I say, Mr. Speaker, in any Congress of the United States where justice and love of fair play prevailed, it would be said on that matter, the account is closed; that the American people had settled it; that it had met with the approval of all.

Again, during the last fall, when the cloud of a war with Spain looked threatening, at the command of the President he expended much money in preparation, and thus made himself short of means, which would otherwise have been at his command to meet the ordinary current expenses of the year, and to pay on contracts for furnishing the iron-clads This, too, the country approved.

I am told by my colleague [Mr. HOAR] that it is a thing which the ministry of England would have done and have done a hundred times. Then should George M. Robeson, Secretary of the Navy, be indicted for high crimes and misdemeanors for doing that which the interests of the country demanded, which the honor of the flag demanded, which the Congress of the United States and the American people have approved? Is it not a little late for the Committee on Naval Affairs to undertake to drag into the highest court of the country Mr. Robeson for this act?

I have said, Mr. Speaker, there was no limit to this investigation. I do not know why gentlemen confined themselves to the administration of George M. Robeson.

The doors of the investigation were by this Congress thrown wide open, and these gentlemen had a right, if they pleased, to go back and investigate the conduct of the war, and investigate Mr. Gideon Welles, who went into retirement at the end of the last Administration, bearing the honor of having stood by his country in its hour of utmost peril. Why has he not been investigated? Why have not these gentlemen undertaken to investigate the conduct of the war for putting down the rebellion, and see whether there was not some corruption that could be brought to light. Thank God, Gideon Welles, who exercised a greater power than any Secretary of the Navy since the foundation of the Government, is allowed to pass on, honored and respected, without having his conduct re-opened and exposed to harsh and cruel criticism. But he would not himself stand in this presence and say he had not used power, more power than Secretary Robeson ever wielded, and more arbitrarily and with a more despotic hand than even this committee charge upon the present Secretary. Why not investigate him?

I desire here to call attention of the House to a fact in relation to the transactions of the Secretary with the London house of Jay Cooke, McCulloch & Co., which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] from want of time probably omitted to state. It is this: that so careful and faithful was he to the interests of his country that he took such ample security for all advances that not one dollar will be lost to the Treasury. He should, amid all this crimination and abuse, have ample and full credit for every good and wise act, and this should not be omitted.

Mr. Speaker, as I have promised a few minutes of my time to other gentlemen, I must omit some of the items of this indictment, and come to the end. And what is the end? Mr. Speaker, where is the measure to correct abuses? Why, Mr. Speaker, the majority of the committee point to two measures and suggest a few more. They point to the fact that they have passed through this House a measure abolishing the office of civil engineer in the Navy Department, as if that honor belonged to them. I dispute the honor with the gentlemen who made that report. That was a measure which met the hearty concurrence of every gentleman of the committee of both politics alike. Well, sir, there is next the matter requiring a specific statement of appropriations. That measure has passed, and met my approval. What else?

Why, sir, it is said that this committee are about to recommend a mixed commission to take the whole subject of the Navy into their hands and to pass upon it. Well, sir, I approve of that measure too. But there was another measure long ago adopted by our committee, and that was a measure recommending the appointment of a board of naval commissioners who should have power to advise the Secretary of the Navy and to assist him in his great work. I was directed by the chairman, in company with one or two other gentlemen, to draw the bill covering that proposition of the committee. I drew the bill, and it is numbered upon the files of the House as No. 3692. In that bill I sought, and I think I successfully accomplished my purpose—I sought to have made as part of it provisions which would create a complete control over the employment of men in the navy-yards. I think the bill should become a law. It gave to that board of commissioners power to enact a code of law governing that subject which, when accepted by the President and Secretary of the Navy, should be law unless repealed or modified by Congress itself. And yet, sir, that measure does not appear with our report. It has gone back to the committee-room, and there it sleeps the sleep of death. But when I had introduced that bill as a measure under the direction of the committee, I was announced in the newspaper press of the country as a republican who had undertaken to interfere with the Navy. My bill drawn for the protection of the Navy was thus thrown back in my face as a bill started by a republican for base purposes. That bill sleeps the sleep in the committee-room; the sleep which, I fear, knows no waking.

What other measure did they recommend? What else have they done? What else do they propose to try? What other measure have they for reform in the Navy? Nothing.

Now I am admonished that my time has expired. Almost every other gentleman who has spoken on the subject has spoken upon portions of the testimony and adverted to details which I had intended to have spoken upon. But I must leave the subject here and give my friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] five minutes of my time. But before concluding I desire to say that while the committee charged with the duty of finding high crimes and misdemeanors against Mr. George M. Robeson have spent seven months in trying to do it, they come at last to the melancholy confession that they are not able upon the law, or testimony either, to find that fact. They now say, perhaps another committee of the House may be able to find it.

Mr. Speaker, I want to say that if this House does not pass one way or another upon this question it will be accused of having seized upon the only remaining chance to hold Mr. Robeson up during the campaign which is upon the country to scorn and contumely and contempt unjustly and for party purposes. It will be said of it that while in the discharge of this great duty it was bound to pronounce ay or no at once. By the adoption of the resolution of the majority it has shown that while "willing to wound it was yet afraid to strike."

I yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON.]

Mr. KASSON. I ask the Clerk to read from the last page of the report of the majority of the committee the clause I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

Your committee do not hesitate to recommend that all officers of the Navy who have been connected with any of the frauds and corruptions disclosed by this investigation shall be brought to speedy trial before a court-martial, with a view that if unjustly charged they may be vindicated, and that if guilty they may be speedily and vigorously punished and the service relieved; yet they do find in the case of the Secretary some embarrassment in recommending what shall be the measure and manner of his punishment, arising from the present condition of the law, as viewed by at least a portion of your committee.

Mr. KASSON. I call the attention of the House, Mr. Speaker, to that part of the report just read, which has been overlooked so far as I know by the gentlemen who have hitherto spoken. And I desire their attention to it in connection with the resolution with which the report closes, and upon which it is proposed this House shall vote. That resolution fails to ask the House to vote a censure; fails to ask the House to impeach; fails to find the officers guilty; fails to find the Secretary guilty; fails of everything with which it is customary to close a report upon investigation of a Department or upon the conduct of an official. It evades the entire responsibility which points to one man as the object of punishment, or to one law as the object of repeal.

I am going to appeal to the gentlemen on the floor of this House upon a point of national honor and of personal character. The instinct of every honorable member rebels against an insinuated dishonor upon the réputation of a gentleman of his acquaintance. You withdraw from it in disgust as from an act of cowardice. When you say, suggestively and whisperingly, if such a man did so and so he ought to be punished, he is a man dishonored in the presence of his neighbors and his country; while you dare not openly make the charge, you dishonor yourself. When you say of George M. Robeson we cannot say whether he has been guilty, or what he has been guilty of, or for what he shall be punished, but recommend that the suspicions be referred to another committee who are to go over four thousand printed pages of your report, the work of seven months, and instruct them to inquire whether they cannot find that he has been guilty of some offense for which he may be punished, I affirm that it is an evasion, and that you are guilty of conduct toward a gentleman, a public officer of your acquaintance, for he is such officially, which you would scorn and spurn from you if it were attempted to be perpetrated upon yourselves. Not only that, sir, but you leave by the language of your report which the Clerk has read the floating cloud of dishonor over the whole corps of gallant officers of our Navy, without specifying a name upon which the cloud can rest. Do you mean the gallant name of Admiral Porter? Do you mean that peerless gentleman, Admiral Rodgers? Do you mean the brilliant officers who gallantly sailed up the harbor of Mobile and there restored our flag? Do you mean the heroes who so gallantly broke the chain of fire before New Orleans? Whom do you mean to insult and wound by the indefinite, calumnious language which I have had read at the Clerk's desk? Who is it that has dishonored that country's service to which his honor was pledged? Who is it of whom you say that if he is not guilty he ought to be indicted, and if guilty he ought to be punished?

Sir, I stand here in defense of the honor of that Navy, I care not who assails it. When you start a cloud of calumny through the atmosphere of the United States and suspend it over all the officers of the Navy you are insulting the flag of your country and the honor of the men who have rendered it glorious at home and abroad on all the seas of the world. I appeal again to gentlemen, not to politicians; and I ask if this is honorable conduct toward those upon whom you confidently depend for defense against foreign aggressors and to maintain the honor of the flag and the country at the peril of their own honor and their lives?

No, sir; if you report a man guilty and we find him guilty, we will vote him guilty here and now. If you say that you do not know who is guilty, in Heaven's name do not by the adoption of this report impose this vile stain upon the hitherto stainless honor of a corps which has illuminated the pages of our history with the record of its brilliant deeds.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. In accordance with the agreement made by the House, I now call the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to allow me to enter a motion to recommit the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. No, sir; I must insist on my motion.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask the gentleman to allow me to test the sense of the House on that question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The sense of the House can be just as well tested upon the motion for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will let me enter the motion.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I cannot yield to the gentleman.

The question was put on seconding the demand for the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 81, noes 70.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. MORRISON.]

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now take a recess until eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. The House having ordered the previous question, I understand that the pending question goes over until Monday, and that I will then have the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably; the House has ordered the main question to be now put, and nothing can deprive the gentleman of his right to the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. Will that cut off the call of States for bills?

Mr. HALE. Will the right of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. WHITTHORNE] accrue before the morning hour or after it?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably before the morning hour. The House has ordered the main question to be now put, which means, in case the House now adjourns, when the House next meets for legislative purposes.

Mr. WHITTHORNE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered; and I move to lay that motion on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York, was granted a leave of absence for ten days from Tuesday next.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, was granted a leave of absence for ten days.

Mr. HATHORN was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. SPENCER was granted leave of absence for one week.

Mr. ELLIS was granted leave for fifteen days.

Mr. WOODWORTH was granted leave of absence indefinitely.

Mr. ODELL was granted leave of absence for three days.

Mr. FAULKNER was granted leave of absence for one week from the 31st instant.

Mr. HUNTER was granted leave of absence indefinitely from the 30th instant.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. PLAISTED, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of Jonathan White.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORRISON. I move that the House now take a recess until eight o'clock this evening.

Mr. CONGER. Before the question is taken upon that motion I desire to submit a resolution calling upon the Secretary of the Treasury to furnish some information in relation to the soundings at the mouth of the Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That requires unanimous consent.

There was no objection.

SOUTH PASS OF THE MISSISSIPPI RIVER.

Mr. CONGER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed to furnish to the House the following information:

First, a chart of soundings made by the Coast Survey last May in front of the jetties at the South Pass in the Gulf of Mexico;

Second, a comparative chart showing the result of the survey of 1875 made by the Coast Survey, and the result of the last survey above named, so far as both surveys embrace the same area in advance of the jetties; and,

Third, a statement of the average increase of depth in front of the jetties and within the area embraced by both surveys, as indicated by a comparison of the soundings shown by the two surveys.

Mr. CONGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HOLMAN. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] that the House now take a recess until eight o'clock. Before putting that motion, the Chair will state that by order of the House the session for this evening will be for debate only, no other business whatever to be transacted.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and forty-five minutes p. m.) the House took a recess until eight o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, the House re-assembled at eight o'clock p. m. and was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House, on motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] the session of this evening will be for debate only upon the bill (H. R. No. 3926) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue, and upon other bills, no business whatever to be transacted. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MORRISON] is entitled to the floor.

INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. Speaker, the bill under consideration (H. R. No. 3926) to amend the laws relating to internal revenue proposes sundry changes in the laws relating to the collection of internal revenue. The amendments proposed are in the main such as experience has shown to be necessary to the more efficient working of the internal-revenue system and the more certain collection of internal taxes.

The bill and its several provisions were carefully considered by a subcommittee, with the aid of experts from the Revenue Office. My colleagues of the committee, Messrs. HANCOCK and BURCHARD, who were of this subcommittee, will give such explanations of the details of the bill as may be required. It relates wholly to the collection of taxes imposed by existing laws, but imposes none. None are increased, none diminished.

It has been discovered and declared at the other end of the Capitol, in relation to internal taxes, and especially in relation to the tax upon tobacco and spirits, "that it is useless to say that the people are now ground down by taxation imposed by the National Government. That is a delusion among honest men, and it is a fraud whenever it is represented by anybody else, because there is not a particle of truth in it. It is a tax upon luxury; it is a tax upon indulgence; it is a tax upon vice;" and that "taxation by customs" (tariff) "is a protection and encouragement" to industries. In other words, that taxes should not be reduced to diminish the burdens of the people; that our internal taxes ought rather to be maintained to repress luxury, indulgence, and vice, and our tariffs to foster and encourage industries. And so it would seem that in "taxation by the National Government" under the present system we have another national blessing; so it is in effect declared in the Senate. And thus may be explained the purpose of our friends over the way in giving us as the last and parting act of the last Congress a bill adding to the burdens of taxation.

Accustomed to regard taxes, in whatever form levied, as burdens rightfully borne and rightfully imposed to the extent of the needs of good government, and to this extent only I have believed with a great many good people of the country that "the people are ground down by taxes imposed by the National Government;" ground down by reason of improvident and extravagant expenditures to the extent, at least, of our reduction in the annual expenditures amounting to nearly $30,000,000 and much more by reason of the frauds in the collection of the revenue and in consequence of the defects and viciousness of the revenue system itself.

Senatorial wisdom has also discovered that burdens of taxation depend wholly upon tax bills and are not lessened by reductions of appropriations and expenditures. Whatever sums are appropriated and expended must be taken from the earnings of labor. Without the reductions that have been and are being made, the demands of the Government for ordinary expenditures and for the annual requirements of the public debt could not be met without imposing additional burdens upon the earnings of labor, in the form of new interest-bearing loans or increased taxation.

Let us see if this statement is not borne out by the official figures, by comparing the amount of appropriations made by us and those of a permanent character provided for by law with the amount of receipts which we may safely and prudently rely upon for this fiscal year. The appropriations made by us and to be made, supposing the remaining differences between the House and the Senate to be divided midway, will amount in round numbers to $119,000,000. The permanent appropriations heretofore provided by law amount to about $147,000,000. These are for interest on the public debt, $96,154,848; for the sinking fund, $34,063,377; and for miscellaneous expenditures, such as collection of customs, &c., $16,411,694. So that the total requirements of the Government for this year, for annual and permanent appropriations, will amount to about $266,000,000. And this is fifty millions below the Department estimates.

Now, what receipts may we safely and prudently rely upon for this year? Our receipts from customs for the year ending with last month were $147,057,978 as against $157,167,722 for the previous year—ten millions less. The difference would have been more than twenty millions based upon the difference or falling off in imports, which were in the year ending June 30, 1875, of dutiable, $379,795,113, and in the year ending June 30, 1876, only $320,000,000. The same rate of falling off in imports for this year as occurred last year would reduce our receipts from customs to $123,000,000. If we take the average falling off for the last three years as the basis for the falling off this year, it would reduce our receipts to $127,000,000. Viewed from the most hopeful stand-point, we cannot prudently rely upon a revenue from this source to greatly exceed $130,000,000.

The receipts for the year just closed from internal revenue were $116,000,000, as against $110,000,000 for the year 1875; nine millions more. It will be seen by an examination of the sources from which the receipts come that while the amount of internal taxes has increased, the production of the articles taxed has fallen off; and but for the increased rates laid on by the last Congress the revenue from this source on the quantities of the articles taxed would have fallen off several millions. The taxable gallons of spirits fell off from 62,687,692 in 1875, to 58,700,000 in 1876. The quantity of tobacco and snuff fell off from 119,435,875 pounds in 1875, to 110,246,020 in 1876; nearly ten million pounds. Allowing for a like falling off in the present year, as has been the average of decrease for the last three years in the quantities of articles taxed, and our internal-revenue receipts would amount to $107,000,000 only. Making the most liberal allowance for an improvement in the honesty and efficiency heretofore so lacking in the collection of whisky and other taxes, we may reasonably expect $115,000,000, possibly $120,000,000.

From miscellaneous sources the Department estimate is $19,000,000. When we remember that the premium on sales of gold is an important item in this estimate, and that this year we shall have little if any gold to sell, we well know how unsafe it is to rely upon more than $16,000,000 from miscellaneous sources. So estimated, we shall have $130,000,000 from customs, $120,000,000 from internal revenue, and $16,000,000 from miscellaneous sources; in all, $266,000,000 with which to meet the $266,000,000 of estimated annual and permanent appropriations.

So it will be seen, Mr. Speaker, that while it cannot be determined with certainty what will be the exact amount of revenue receipts for the current year, yet it is plain that the taxes as laid will yield us with all our reductions and expenditures no more than the annual requirements of the Government, and but for these reductions we would be compelled to resort to new loans or find new subjects of taxation, thus further oppressing an already overburdened people. By a revision of the tariff we might obtain increased revenue with less taxation. Under present conditions this is impracticable, for our friends over the way, whose political associates are in the majority in the Senate, have already declared in a resolution offered by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. ADAMS,] in which declaration they are no doubt in accord with their political friends in the Senate, that "legislation affecting the tariff is at this time inexpedient."

Possibly we might obtain increased receipts from internal taxes by a reduction of rates; yet we must remember that these receipts are principally from tobacco and whisky, and that at the other end of the Capitol taxes on tobacco and whisky are not regarded as burdens to be removed from the industries of the people, but as helps to the extermination of luxury, indulgence, and vice. Certainly these would not be reduced by the Senate "at this time."

I know it has been said that there is no sincerity in our efforts to relieve the people by a reduction of expenditures unless we make like reductions in taxes.

I have shown that with all our reductions we shall have no surplus, and why any reduction, if proposed here, must fail in the Senate. Those who falsely proclaim this insincerity would probably parade any proposition made here for a reduction or removal of taxes, with receipts falling off as they are, as evidence of an evil purpose on the part of the majority here to deprive the Government of its necessary means of support. I prefer rather that all who regard the truth shall be compelled to admit that we have been so mindful of the interests and the honor of the Government as not to disturb any of its sources of supply, while we have by a prudent economy lessened the demands upon it by many millions.

I trust therefore that only such amendments will be offered to the bill as relate to perfecting the internal-revenue system and the collection of taxes, and not the increase or decrease in the rates of taxation.

COLLECTION OF TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. MEADE. Mr. Speaker, there is no branch of the public service in which there have been such enormous and notorious abuses as in the Bureau charged with the collection of internal revenue. For nigh twelve years the scandals regarding this particular service have been ringing in the public ear, while the Treasury has been plundered and the list of ruined reputations has gone on increasing, and yet no well-defined or systematic legislative policy has been adopted to prevent their recurrence. The country had a right to expect upon the advent of this House, whose responsible majority came here pledged to reform, that it would enact some measure looking to the abolition of these abuses. Individual members have certainly not been backward in introducing bills which were believed to accomplish the desired result. Several bills have been introduced and appropriately referred, and these, as though to prove the correctness of the general theory, agree in a remarkable degree in essential particulars.

The evils of the present system are more distinctly exhibited in the collection of the tax on distilled spirits, and it is to a brief consideration of this branch of the subject that I ask the indulgence of the House. The flagrant abuses which here exist point directly to radical defects in existing laws, for in face of many evidences for a contrary opinion I am not of those who believe that the race of honest men has entirely run out in the republican party, or that honest and efficient officers cannot be found to execute just and efficient laws. Experience, moreover, shows that while in a great degree more capable men might have been selected in numerous instances, yet the laws themselves as they now stand rather encourage than prevent the frauds which have so long disgraced the service and the country.

REFORM IN THE OFFICIAL SYSTEM THE FIRST GREAT OBJECT.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is, I know, quite the habit to regard any measure having in view a reform of the civil service as purely theoretical, an ebullition of the doctrinaire; but our experience in the internal branch of the Government should satisfy us that some great reform is needed in the public service, and that we must adopt something less yielding, something more exacting than party fellowship. Whoever has examined this subject will agree with me that the duties of this Bureau are of too grave a character to admit of party interference, and that the popular proverb concerning party patronage, "to the victors belong the spoils," should not only be modified in its application to this Bureau, but be jealously restricted, if not dispensed with altogether.

We may receive valuable light in this regard from the policy which has been adopted in England respecting this service. The applicant for position there must not only be examined by a board of capable and experienced men entirely removed from political influence, but he must thereafter pass a course of tutelage with frequent intermediate examinations before being installed into the responsible duties of such position. I would not only make such a rule applicable here, but I would in addition thereto provide frequent transfers from one district or department to another, so that no sufficient time should elapse in which to form combinations or rings. And it is in this way only that we can avoid the frauds and disgrace which have all along characterized our revenue service. Look at it as we may, scrutinize it, dissect it, analyze it, and we irresistibly arrive at the same conclusion, of the necessity for reform in the official system.

At an early day in this session I had the honor of introducing in this House a bill (H. R. No. 2331) having in view various reforms in the collection of taxes on distilled spirits. Its provisions embodied the experience of the most reliable and competent men engaged in the wine and spirit business in this country, and it had not only the generous support of substantially the entire trade engaged in legitimate business, but as well a large share of the newspaper press in those cities where the subject is one of greatest interest. I regret that the Committee of Ways and Means have not in all particulars adopted the provisions of that bill, but I am gratified to know that many of them have received the approbation of that committee, and that the remainder will have ample opportunity for consideration by this House when the bill now under consideration shall be in order for amendment. I have reason to believe that the more important of these provisions not already adopted will then be accepted by the committee and, as I trust, by a large majority of the members of this House. This bill provides in an especial manner for reform in the official service.

While the selection of incompetent officers for merely party reasons is provided against, a large number of those whose time is now employed in political rather than professional duties are dispensed with and by the application of this principle and abolishing a multitude of perfunctory duties, involving enormous expenditures not only in salaries but in stationery, and the great army of incidentals, a reduction of the official force is effected from thirty-seven hundred and thirty-four, exclusive of deputy collectors, to twelve hundred and twelve, including deputy collectors. The latter figure does not, however, include clerks in the Bureau at Washington, but the adoption of the bill referred to would enable fully three-quarters of those employés to be dispensed with and effect a direct saving in the Department expenses of $2,500,000. The more efficient the officers the less the number required, and a rational system and reasonable rates of taxation would soon bring about the opportunity for even a greater reduction of the force, which is now altogether too large even for the present system. For example, in the city of New York there are now four collection districts. In that city there are no distilleries, and the duties of selling stamps for lager-beer, which is largely manufactured in one part of the island, and collecting payment for special taxes or licenses, and the taxes for the manufacturing of tobacco, and preventing the running of illicit stills, could be thoroughly performed by one collector and one set of subordinate officers.

In the State of New York there are sixteen collection districts. Under a proper system, with efficient officers, these districts could be reduced at once, certainly to five: one with an office at Brooklyn, one at New York City, one at Albany, one in central New York, and one at Buffalo. I speak of my own State as an example, because I know it best, but the same thing can be accomplished to an equal degree in other States the moment that the revenue force is held strictly down to its legitimate functions of collecting internal taxes and preventing evasions of the law. In the system I am advocating, every officer is under bonds for the faithful performance of his duty. Every officer has definite and specified duties to perform and has that inducement to assiduity and honesty in his employment which can only be secured by the prospect of professional advancement and success. There is nothing unrepublican about it; on the contrary, it is the most republican of systems, for once in the profession the duties and powers of which are clearly defined and limited by law, the future of every man is dependent, not upon favoritism or other adventitious circumstances, but upon his own exertions and merit alone; and this is true republicanism and true democracy. It is simply proposed to apply to the Government business those principles which every bank, commercial corporation, and business house applies to analogous employment.

I may be here allowed to digress for a moment to point out the enormity of the frauds in distilled spirits which have been perpetrated upon this branch of the service from 1864 to the present time, which I cannot better do than by quoting the language of the honorable Senator from Georgia, [Mr. GORDON,] who has given the matter apparently the most careful consideration. He says:

If we have manufactured but the 100,000,000 gallons per annum from 1864 to the present time we have had due to the Government the taxes upon 1,300,000,000 gallons in thirteen years in which this tax has been imposed, the tax varying from 20 cents to $2 per gallon. By a simple calculation, for which any school-boy is competent, it will be seen we should have received into the Treasury up to the termination of the last fiscal year, $1,260,000,000. How much has been received? Let Commissioner Pratt state: "Four hundred and eighty-nine millions;" say in round numbers four hundred and ninety millions less the cost of collection, or net about four hundred and fifty millions. Deduct this amount from the twelve hundred and sixty millions, and we have at once the colossal fraud of $800,000,000. But appalling as this sum is it becomes almost insignificant when we take into consideration the facts which we must, that since then, as I have before stated, not only has our population increased but the entire Southern States have been added to the producers and consumers, and the additional fact which all experience proves, that the consumption of spirits, like the aggregation of all other sins, multiplies with the increase of population. If we take, I say, these facts into consideration, we shall find that we have perpetrated a fraud of more than one thousand millions of money; and I defy the successful refutation of the statement. It has on an average $1,200,000,000 of money. Where is it, sir? Has it gone into the pocket of the consumers? Not at all; for the price which the consumer has paid has varied but little whether the tax was 20 cents or $2 per gallon. Where is it gone? This gigantic sum of money which was due to the Government has gone into the pockets of dishonest distillers or, what is infinitely worse, into the pockets of the dishonest Government officials, a sink in individual and official corruption, in political and national demoralization and disgrace.

And as if this were not enough to show the utter incompetency of the system, we have the further evidence that in 1867 there were three hundred taxable articles in the internal-revenue branch of service with an official list or roster of fifty-nine hundred and eighty-five, aside from the various clerks in assessors' offices numbering not less than five hundred. The number of taxable articles is now reduced to four, namely: spirits, tobacco, beer, and stamps upon checks, matches, and patent medicines. Yet the number upon the official list remains at 3,734, besides an indefinite supply of deputy collectors, and the expenses of collection, which in 1867 were seven and a half million dollars, amounted last year to over five and a half million dollars.

These evils or abuses it is intended to correct by the bill in question, which in its provisions reduces the number of officials to 1,212, with salaries something less than $2,000,000.

Besides all this it is desirable that the tenure of office should be made dependent upon the good behavior of the incumbent and that a regular system of promotion should be adopted as a reward for efficient service, so that the position of an official in the Internal Revenue Bureau should become in every way as honorable and as independent as that of an officer in either the Army or naval service of the Government. It is in this way only that we may expect an efficient and honest attention to business, and that we may make the duty of collecting the revenue upon which the Government is to subsist an honorable one and removed from the influences and intrigues of either mere local or general politics. As it is now the system amounts to one of mere compensation for party service, the appointing power being so completely under the influence of local politics that the appointee is from the first paralyzed in his efforts to honestly discharge his duties and becomes a ready, and easy, if not a willing instrument in the hands of those whom in his neighborhood he looks up to as influential to retain him in his position.

REDUCE THE RATE OF TAXATION.

Another provision in the course of practical reform in the collection of taxes on distilled spirits is a reduction of the rate of tax. The present first cost of one gallon of proof spirits is about fifteen cents, sometimes varying a few cents either way from that figure, according to the season and the price of grain. The tax as we know is now ninety cents on every such gallon, or 600 per cent. on the cost of manufacture, while other small charges on various pretenses are levied in a general way upon the rectifier and dealer.

A glance will suffice to satisfy the most uninformed on this subject that this disproportion between cost of production and the rate of tax is calculated to create an unwholesome desire to escape the latter, both because of the enormous capital in ready money required to carry on even a moderate business and also for the reason that a small fraudulent saving of tax gives greater profit than the legitimate gains of large manufacture. The Government, it is true, only looks for the largest revenue; but in so doing reference is to be had to various surrounding circumstances and the point where it ceases to be profitable to evade the law and cheat the State out of its dues is the most important and one which can only be ascertained by experience. Under this head the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, in his last annual report, has favored us with the following valuable information:

Excessive taxation may be the cause of general and systematic fraud leading to great loss of revenue, but production and consumption go on as before, whatever the taxes. This is well illustrated in the years while the tax was $2 on the gallon. Take for illustration the year 1868. The taxes derived from this source during the year were less than $19,000,000, while in 1869, when the rate was reduced to fifty cents they ran up to $45,000,000, and the year following to $55,000,000. Yet no one can doubt that the actual production in gallons did not essentially differ in the years named. Looking over the entire period since duty was first imposed by the act of July 1, 1862, when Congress moved with the same timidity and moderation in taxing this article which characterized its action in 1791, when the experiment was first made, we are struck with surprise at the great difference in the receipts from the sources named. Thus:

The collections were, during the fiscal year ending June 30—

1864	30,329,149 53
1865	18,731,422 45
1866	33,268,171 82
1867	33,542,951 72
1868	18,655,630 90
1869	45,071,230 86
1870	55,606,094 15
1871	46,281,848 10
1872	49,475,516 36
1873	52,099,371 78
1874	49,444,089 85
1875	52,081,991 12
Showing a sum-total of receipts from spirits of	489,763,999 14

Thus we perceive that during the four years from 1864 to 1868, while the tax for six months was $1.50 per gallon and for the balance of the period $2 per gallon, the annual revenue was nearly five and a half millions less than during the six succeeding years, (July, 1868, to January, 1875,) while the average tax was less than seventy cents per gallon, although during the first-mentioned period it is well known that the demand was much greater than during the last, and the year in which the Government was in receipt of the largest income was in 1870, when the tax was least of all, being only fifty cents a gallon, with some special charges added, realizing altogether $55,581,599.18. These are facts which are incontrovertible and show conclusively that the true interest of the Government lies in a reduced tax of fifty cents per gallon, as recommended by the best experience which we now possess.

Not only will such a reduction prove a preventive of fraud but it will further tend to increase the manufacture, for this branch of business equally with all others has suffered from great depression, with a consumption falling below production. If this were a question of temperance I am aware objections might be found to any increase in the production, but experience shows us there is very little difference, if any, between hard and flush times in the consumption of spirits by those who use it for potable or drinking purposes. The demand for the use of spirits for scientific and manufacturing purposes must be met. It is shown that while heretofore three-fifths of the whole product has been consumed for such latter purposes, it is now reduced by reason of high taxation to one-half of such production. It will thus be seen that reform in the official system and reduction of tax go hand in hand both to increase the revenue of the Government and protect and encourage the honest dealer and manufacturer.

I have refrained from going into an examination of the various modes suggested for imposing the tax. Either mode, each of which has its advocates, will be more nearly successful with the reform in the system which is proposed, and I would be willing to adopt either for the present, subject to such alterations or changes as the future shall indicate. But if we would effectually purify our system of the rottenness which now exists in it, then it is essential that we cut off the army of spies and informers which hang around the business, blackmailing manufacturer and dealer alike down to the smallest retailer. To accomplish this, the tax should be collected at the distillery, from which time the domestic product should have all the presumption of honesty that now attaches to foreign articles. The present spy system is not only enormously expensive and demoralizing in its tendency, but inflicts the greatest injury upon honest dealers everywhere, until now it has become a serious question with the trade whether it is best to continue a business which completely places capital and even commercial reputation at the caprice and will of oftentimes ignorant and dishonest officials, operating through a system which offers to them so many covers and inducements to fraud. With the tax once collected under proper precautions at the distillery, the necessity for such espionage and its attendants, ignorance and willful injustice, will disappear. It is contrary to the spirit of our institutions that a system should longer exist here which has been the most hateful feature of tyrannical European governments.

Another and imperative reason why this tax should be altered now is that by the act of March 5, 1875, during a period when fraud was at its maximum, as has since been made plain to all by the proceedings in western courts, the increase from seventy cents to ninety cents was made in the direct interest of the fraudulent rings and by their agency. The Revenue Bureau, whose confidence was abused, was led to certify to the complete collection of taxes and the belief that a higher rate of tax could be collected as well as seventy cents. At that very moment in some of the largest distilling points in the country only thirty cents per gallon were being paid. The advance of tax was then a fraud upon Congress, which it is incumbent upon Congress immediately to repeal. The only argument against reduction is that the country could not spare revenue now and the old story that now the revenue is being collected, an assertion made on no better foundation than last year, and in face of the fact that we are still short of the receipts of 1870, that the evidences of unlicensed production are plain in all quarters, and that it is again found necessary to change the head and important officers of the Bureau. Were the tax being collected, the total revenue this year from spirits would not be less than $80,000,000; $72,000,000 from the gallon tax and $8,000,000 from the special taxes. Over $25,000,000 have certainly been lost this year through fraud. It is said, that consumption has largely decreased as compared with last year; but this assertion has no foundation. Times were hard last year as well as this, and the decreased manufacture arising from extra tax is compensated for by the natural increase of population and other causes which combine to produce the effect which David A. Wells so aptly terms "the elasticity of revenue."

The wise economy of this Congress in cutting down appropriations, and consequently expenditures, to extent of $25,000,000, affords an excellent opportunity of reducing rates of taxation without any possibility of deficiency of revenue. The collectable production of the country at a fifty-cent tax would most certainly exceed 80,000,000 of gallons, which, at fifty cents per gallon, would give a gallon tax of $40,000,000, and with $8,000,000 from special taxes, would make total revenue from spirits $48,000,000; while the decrease, expenses of collection—not merely through the Treasury Department, but through the Departments of Justice and War—would give a net revenue fully equal to that obtained in 1874 from seventy cents, or in 1875 from ninety cents.

EXPORTATION IN BOND.

It should require no argument to satisfy any one that the true policy of the Government is to encourage any business which will give us exportation for our staple products; for it is only by our export trade that we are able to make a set-off to the large, and we might say extravagant, importations which require the payment of enormous sums of money abroad. Since our tremendous war debt, which has been so largely taken by foreigners, the necessity for developing in every possible manner all our opportunities for exportation is greatly increased.

In the matter of distilled spirits the United States is so situated respecting the cheapness of her grains and especially corn, and also in facilities for bringing those grains to the seaboard for shipment, that we ought to monopolize substantially the entire trade of the world in distilled spirits; and yet for some inscrutable reason it would appear, from the laws regulating exportation of such spirits as well as from the regulations of the Department having the subject in charge, that it had become the settled policy of this Government to impede as far as practicable all business enterprise in that direction. How far this Chinese policy has been a success may be discovered by the following:

Statement showing the exports of distilled spirits from the United States for the twenty fiscal years from 1857 to 1876 inclusive.

*Exports for June are partly estimated.

It will be perceived from the foregoing exhibit that the export business was in a flourishing condition up to 1864, when the internal-revenue laws first affected it. From that time on there has been a steady average decline until this date, showing a difference between the receipts for the years 1863 and 1875 of over $3,000,000 loss to this country by reason of the pernicious system which has been adopted respecting the exports of distilled spirits, to say nothing of the large natural increase of trade which would undoubtedly but for this system have amounted ere this to a sum in the neighborhood of $20,000,000; all of which is lost not only to the country generally but to the farmer in particular, who by reason of such additional demand would have been able to obtain a much better price for his grain, where fifty-six pounds is concentrated into four pounds of high-proof alcohol. There is no other way in which the western farmer can send his grain abroad to such advantage to himself and American manufactures as in the shape of distilled spirits.

A simple illustration of the manner in which the exporter of spirits is embarrassed would be as follows: A single package of alcohol, containing say eighty-five gallons, is worth, say 25 cents per proof gallon or $21.25 for the entire package. Now, in order to make shipment abroad the exporter is required to make out two bonds: first, from the distillery to the place of exportation and to the time of actual shipment, and, second, a bond covering the period from time of actual shipment to its landing in foreign port. The exported article pays no duty here, yet nevertheless each of these bonds are required to be made out for double the amount of duty which would be required upon a package in case consumption were had here, or, say $153. The first bond of course is taken up at the time of the issue of the second, but the second bond cannot be canceled until all the circumlocutory proofs are furnished which are technically required by the Department, and it generally happens that from twelve to eighteen months must elapse before any such shipment bond can be taken up and canceled, so that it comes to be that in a very small business the amount of bonds alone required to carry it on is so great that no one of average or even large means can continue in it.

The figures I have given for the probable present natural exportation of spirits may seem large, but in 1863 we were beginning to export largely, not merely alcohol, but cologned spirits and other finer forms of spirits, and there were reliable indications of the development abroad of a demand for bourbon and rye whiskies of American manufacture; and furthermore our manufactures of drugs and chemicals and toilet articles were building up a large export trade, especially with South America, in compounds of which alcohol was an essential part. Cramped as it has been by law, the exportation of spirits has suffered still more from the varied and contradictory decisions and regulations of the Bureau, which, issued often without the semblance of authority of law, and sometimes almost in plain violation of it, destroyed all security or permanency in the business. For example, at one time by one of these regulations, no bonds were accepted without qualification upon entirely unencumbered real estate. A man might own a piece of property worth $1,000,000, but if there was a mortgage on it for $10,000 he was not available as security on an exportation bond.

This is but one of many illustrations of the obstacles which are constantly harassing and embarrassing the trade and shows the absolute necessity for a rigid and thorough reform in the entire system regulating the manufacture and trade in distilled spirits. The particular evil, as we have before observed, lies in the very grave defects in the official system and the enormous, disproportionate, and suicidal tax of ninety cents per gallon in the face of all experience in favor of a lower rate.

It seems to me that in this matter of so large a revenue to the Government and in our present straitened condition of finances it becomes a matter of the utmost importance that we should take deliberate, careful, and decisive action before the adjournment of this House.

Administrative reform is the admitted great necessity of the day. The place to apply the reform is where the evil is greatest. The time to apply it, now. Delay gives longer excuse to fraud, which inevitably gains with fearful rapidity while its opportunities remain. A vicious system will not reform itself. The responsibility rests upon Congress, whether official extravagance shall be permitted to continue and peculation to thrive or whether by courageous surgery, having well studied the case, we save the life of our revenue system.

APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. FOSTER addressed the House upon the subject of the appropriations made by this Congress. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. GARFIELD addressed the House upon the same subject. [His speech will also appear in the Appendix.]

CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY, ETC.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, we are now approaching the end of this most "weary, stale, flat, and unprofitable" session, and it may not be amiss to look back before we separate and review the course we have been pursuing.

I fear, sir, we shall find few fruits to gather, slight harvest in sound grain for the labor and time expended. But those we represent may take warning at least by the shortcomings of this Congress, and see to it that the public interests are not again committed into the hands of a party which has been so lavish of promises in advance and so barren of performance in the time of trial.

The facetious gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] laid aside some weeks ago his quips and jests and condescended to the sphere of simple fact when, with a sweeping gesture including all of his own side of the House, he solemnly declared that "this is the day of small things." The ludicrous truthfulness of the statement rendered his remark an example of the highest kind of unconscious humor, fit to be reproduced in the next issue of Why We Laugh. The evidences were all around him, and especially in the "masterly inactivity" of his own committee.

Now, Mr. Speaker, nearly two years since, a great popular election was held. Many causes combined to bring about changes in the public mind. Depression in business affairs, stagnation of currency, failures of mercantile enterprise, manufacturing overdone, building of great railways stopped; all these were charged as due to the policy and practice of the party in power. All elements of discontent and division naturally gravitated to the democratic party, the chronic grumbler of twenty years. Then there is always a considerable element which wearies of anything continuous and uniform and seeks change and variety by natural appetite, and this element is always large in this country, and it is to it that is due the apparent impossibility of any settled, continuous, and uniform policy.

These hosts were like those that gathered to David in the cave of Adullam.

The press of the country in many instances devoted itself to the consideration of ephemeral questions, and forgot the grave differences that rest and must always rest on eternal principles of right and wrong.

The republican party was arraigned everywhere before the great tribunal of the people; and in the exercise of that broad license, which the freedom of elections gives and requires, it was charged with all the sins and shortcomings of individual members; it was alleged to have outlived its usefulness, to have had its day, to have performed its purpose, and that its paramount necessity now was to die out of the way of the newly re-organized democracy, whose mission it was to cure all evils; to restore all waste places; to make all citizens free, equal, and contented; to sweep out all vice, public and private, and to restore the dominion of the Constitution and the laws.

What promises, Mr. Speaker, from the party press, the party conventions, and at the hustings! Promises are the cheapest of all cheap currency; they cost nothing to make, nothing to scatter lavishly and broadcast, and as some one says, "Promises are the money of fools." "Let the democrats into power," said they, "and the good times will come; official corruption shall be stopped; business shall be revived; fields shall groan with golden harvests, foreign commerce be restored; internal transportation shall be simplified and cheapened; money shall be solid, abundant, and cheap; values shall be restored; taxes shall be reduced, retrenchment inaugurated, and the Government conducted on the soundest and most economical plans. The South shall groan no more; the great problem of labor and capital, the great struggle of life and liberty, still going on in that section, shall be harmoniously settled, and all feuds and quarrels of race, citizenship, or ownership of property shall disappear under the overshadowing and benignant wings of the new democracy." A real civil-service reform should be effected; Cæsarism, personal government, offices as rewards for personal service, all these and all other evil things should perish before the dawn of the new day.

These were among the inducements held out to the people to glorify the beginning of the second century by the ingress of a democratic majority into the House of Representatives, and these, with not a little of that judicious violence which the Anglo-Saxon deems himself privileged to use toward a weaker people and which was used so far as deemed necessary in more than one State of the South—these causes and these means brought the present majority into this House.

First and foremost among the partisan cries was that of universal corruption among republican office-holders. A charge easy to make; for general condemnations are the refuge of ignorant malice. Is it true? No man denies that always, at all times and in all parties, some bad men obtain places of honor and emolument, and disgrace by their misconduct and their venality themselves and their friends. It was so in the times of Washington and Jefferson, and every other President the nation ever had. High names might be recalled from the distance that gives oblivion that were polluted by jobbery and bribery.

But fortunately we have official documents that show in rare contrasts the fidelity and honesty of official men since 1834. On the 19th day of June, 1876, the Secretary of the Treasury reported to the Senate of the United States a full and detailed statement of receipts and disbursements from January 1, 1834, to June 30, 1875; and also the amount of defalcations in gross and the ratio of losses per $1,000 to the aggregate received and disbursed, in answer to a resolution of the Senate of February 9, 1876.

I have caused this official statement to be tabulated so as to show the exact state by presidential periods, and I commend it to my democratic friends as excellent reading for the vacation, and insert it here in my remarks.

Statement showing the receipts and disbursements of the Government from January 1, 1834, to June 30, 1875; exhibiting also the amount of defalcations and the ratio of losses per $1,000, to the aggregate received and disbursed, arranged in periods as nearly as practicable of four years each. The disbursements for the Post-Office Department are given separately.

FROM JACKSON'S SECOND TERM TO THE END OF BUCHANAN'S TERM.

Gross total receipts and disbursements from January 1, 1834, to June 30, 1861 { $2,950,454,326.44 includes loans and Post-Office. / $2,950,356,731.04 excludes loans and Post-Office.

Gross total losses for the same period, (no loss on loans,) $15,845,354.

Gross total loss on $1,000, including loans and Post-Office, $5.36.

UNDER LINCOLN, JOHNSON, AND GRANT.

Gross total receipts and disbursements from July 1, 1861, to June 30, 1875 { $25,576,209,805.52 includes loans and Post-Office. / $9,701,614,481.43 excludes loans and Post-Office.

Gross total losses for the same period, (no loss on loans,) $14,666,776.07.

Gross total loss on $1,000, including loans and Post-Office, 57 cents!

Gross total loss on $1,000, excluding loans and Post-Office, $1.51!

It appears, then, from the official records of the Treasury Department, prepared in obedience to an order of the Senate, that—

The gross total of receipts and disbursements from the beginning of Jackson's second term to the end of Buchanan's, including loans and Post-Office, was $2,950,454,326 44

The gross total of receipts and disbursements for the same period, excluding loans and Post-Office, was	$2,250,356,731 04
Gross losses	15,845,354 00
Ratio of losses per $1,000 on total receipts and disbursements, including loans and Post-Office	5 36
Ratio on same, excluding loans and Post-Office	7 04

Under Lincoln, Johnson, and Grant both receipts and disbursements were infinitely larger, and yet the gross amount of losses was smaller and the percentage almost ridiculously disproportioned. Thus—

The gross total of receipts and disbursements, including loans and Post-Office, was	$25,576,202,805 32
On the same, including loans and Post-Office	9,701,614,481 43
Gross losses	14,666,776 07
Ratio of losses per $1,000 on total receipts and disbursements, including loans and Post-Office	57
Ratio on same, including loans and Post-Office	1 51

Thus under democracy in its purity before the war, and under republican administration including the war, the receipts and disbursements of the first, including loans and Post-Office, were about one-ninth of the second; the receipts and disbursements of the first, including loans and Post-Office, were about one-fourth of those of the second; while the losses and defalcations of the democratic period were nearly ten times as great when the loans and Post-Office are included, and four and a half times as great when those items are excluded.

But the table bears closer investigation, and you will find, Mr. Speaker, that the nearer you come to this actual time in which we live, to this present, existing, much-abused administration of President Grant, the standard of honor and fidelity, as measured by the official reports, becomes higher and firmer.

The very lowest rate of losses ever reached is in this present presidential term:

On receipts	.22
On disbursements	.26
In the Post-Office	.53

and this tabular statement stands in grand contrast with the record of any President of any party who has ever preceded President Grant.

So much for the charge of gross official dishonesty reaching through and corrupting the entire republican party. The official tables give the lie direct to this wholesale campaign accusation.

Yet in face of these known facts the democratic party in the House organized themselves into a scandal-making machine, took upon themselves the office of professional slanderers, and charged every one of the regular committees of the House, and many special ones, with this unsavory business.

Public business has been willfully neglected; public necessities ignored, and the whole weight and power of Congress devoted to the manufacture of political capital for the pending election.

Every broken official kicked out for thievery, every cashiered officer, every nameless vagabond was invited, solicited, urged to testify. Partly for revenge, partly for witness fees, partly for cheap notoriety, these birds of evil omen flocked to the Capitol, thronged the corridors, took possession of the committee-rooms and of the committees, prompted questions, invented answers, retailed old scandals picked up second-hand, the dead refuse of the streets, to be greedily swallowed by the mouths that stood agape for such carrion food

The common rights of individual citizens were grossly violated, the sanctity of private correspondence outraged, the telegraphic messages unlawfully forced from their proper keepers, citizens imprisoned by order of the House for no valid reason, and all the rights of private individuals secured by the Constitution trampled down by the decree of the House of Representatives. Secret sessions were held, parties charged with wrong-doing kept in ignorance, and the poor privilege granted to all criminals of an open investigation and of meeting witnesses face to face was denied.

In all this one single and most melancholy case of official misdoing has been undeniably made known, and that has been fairly presented to the proper tribunal by the active co-operation of the republicans in the House.

You are now trying, Mr. Speaker, by a most singular report from the Committee on Naval Affairs to smirch the reputation of another officer to whom neither the committee nor the House dare give the benefits of cross-examination of witnesses and of an open impeachment and a fair trial before the Senate and the nation.

Sir, the injustice, the gross partiality, the secret inquisitions of the committees of this House are justly a stench and an offense to the American people. Above all things they like fair play, and that is what the democracy have most carefully refused in the whole course of these examinations.

The next of the democratic war-cries was and is retrenchment. How have you fulfilled this pledge? The House of Representatives delegated its legislative power to the Committee on Appropriations. The rules positively demand that that committee shall report in thirty days from the commencement of the session or give their reasons in writing for the delay. In contempt of the rules, many months were spent before any report was made; not that it was difficult even for that committee to make appropriations according to law, but because they sought to make new law, to break up organizations, and to make radical and perilous changes

They finally reported crude and ill-considered bills; they lopped off salaries from teachers at West Point; they failed to provide means for the cadet hospital; they pinched the cadets themselves on their small allowance, and immortalized themselves by abolishing the only military band supported by the United States.

They struck the diplomatic and consular service in a manner so ignorant and ill-advised as to call forth a most severe and well-deserved rebuke from a party friend and leader, the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.] But his correct knowledge and his clear explanations were in vain; the House sustained the committee.

They crippled the civil service by a pretended economy and invented the great labor-saving principle of a horizontal reduction of salaries and of number of clerks. It was so much easier to say strike off 20 per cent. in number and 10 per cent. in salary than to inquire carefully and laboriously what each branch of the service actually needed. Arithmetic is cheaper than statesmanship. With full knowledge that every head of every Department and of every Bureau protested that they had already gone to the last possible reduction of force in the schedules presented by them to the committee, they stuck to the "rule of three." Knowing that the Pension Office was more than a year behind on its work, that the Surgeon-General was behind ten thousand pension cases for want of clerical force, they reduced both Offices still lower, and postponed still further the hopes of the starving applicants. And the House of Representatives sustained the committee.

They struck the Army—it was natural they should; they ignored the Military Committee and cut down the force to 22,000 men. They undertook dangerous legislation in relation to rank, pay, organization, the proportion of the several arms, and other subjects, and the House sustained them.

But, sir, time would fail me to dissect the random, rash, and blundering legislation of this committee and of the House. No sane man on that committee or in the House believed that these radical and sweeping changes would become laws. They were never meant to be. They were intended by their authors to be overridden in the Senate and yielded by the House; they were as tubs thrown to the whale, or as the gentleman from New York [Mr. Cox] said at Saint Louis and afterward in the House, "We can do without an army until after election."

The whole thing is only obtaining credit under false pretenses, a robbery of ill-paid and hard-worked clerks, who really do the work, to bolster up a sham reputation for economy.

How has this House applied civil-service reform in its own appointments? Has it retained competent officers or appointed new ones for the sole consideration of fitness? Sir, the advent of this democratic House to power was signalized by a pilgrimage such as has not been seen before. Lean, gaunt, famished by long abstinence the multitude of applicants passed belief. From Maryland to Texas came the hordes of office-hunters on the trail of their unhappy patrons, whose life they made miserable by brazen importunity. They trooped to the plunder as the vultures seek the carcass. You selected a Doorkeeper on the sole ground of his experience in the same capacity in the confederate congress, and you summarily turned him out because he honestly wrote to a private friend what you all felt but dared not say: that office was a good thing to have. It was hard on Fitzhugh, for he was not the only man on the floor that felt "biger than old Grant."

You turned out clerk after clerk, gray and experienced in duty, and filled their places with partisans.

You removed disabled Union soldiers and filled their places with others of another stripe, and would have made a clean sweep but for the popular indignation.

You refused at first clerks to some of the committees, but have surreptitiously and in detail appointed more clerks than ever before known.

You have twice exhausted the contingent fund of the House by needless and extravagant sums expended for witnesses on trivial matters, and have run up bills to be met hereafter of frightful amounts for making and printing your investigations.

You have insulted the President by resolutions demanding his authority for the exercise of his official functions outside of the city of Washington, and have been ignominiously convicted of ignorance of law and of history by his crushing reply.

You have demanded elaborate reports on all manner of subjects from the Departments and hindered the public service by exacting these replies on matters which had already been officially reported and were in print.

So much for sins of commission. You have had a session of eight months; what single thing can you show of public benefit? What work has been accomplished, what real reform inaugurated?

Your attention was called both by the President and the Secretary of the Treasury to the practicability and advisability of funding the public debt at 4 per cent. To do this would be the greatest possible relief to the nation, for it is the interest on the debt that kills. Many bills looking to this end went to the Committee of Ways and Means, but we have no report and no action. Is this looking after the interests of the people?

The great question of cheap transportation, although reported on by the proper committee, has been utterly overslaughed, and the House has refused and neglected to consider it and still refuses and neglects to do so.

The great question of currency, embracing in its scope the very life-blood of national prosperity, has been dallied with and trifled with until the country finds as little hope for relief in this double-faced committee as they find in the double-headed presidential ticket of the democratic party. All convictions, if any there were, on this question have been smothered and subordinated to success by false pretenses in the approaching campaign.

But the temper and purposes of this House are best shown by its debates. Professing large and true devotion to the Union, this democratic majority has listened to and applauded the most violent denunciations of the party and the men who saved the national existence, to defiant announcements of a "united South," and to justifications of rebellion and vindication of treason. It has heard and applauded the denial in practice of the rights secured by the constitutional amendments and the assertion of the civil and political supremacy of one race and the foredoomed inferiority and subordination of the other, and has tried by interpolation into the appropriation bills to repeal the law giving to the nation some supervisory power over elections in our great cities and in the Southern States, and thus crush out the chief barrier against fraud and violence against the citizen.

This House has overruled clear principles of law in unseating republican members and in retaining democratic ones, and have thus nullified the voice of the people clearly and fairly expressed.

In looking over the entire record of this session I find no measures of public utility, no question of general importance, perfected, and few if any considered by committees. Thus the people behind us and who are our judges will pass upon this first attempt to revive democratic power, and their verdict will be that it is a sad exhibition, a bad and desperate failure.

There are pending in this House a vast number of bills seeking relief, nearly all from the theater of the late war; bills for the remission of the cotton tax and its repayment; bills for damages done by marching armies, the amount of all which will figure to hundreds of millions; bills to relieve postmasters and mail contractors; bills to repeal restrictions upon commissioning confederate officers in our Army; bills seeking compensation in all manner of ways for those who suffered because they first rebelled.

These, sir, are to wait until "after election," with the implied if not the express promise of northern democrats that in the event of success in that election they shall be favorably considered.

The majority of this House has defied the clear sentiment of the nation, has insulted the enthusiasm of the North, has trifled with its unwavering devotion and its vast sacrifices to maintain the Union, and has shown again the sickening sight of that wretched yielding on great questions to the imperious demands of the South which first won and now continues the well-fitting title of doughface.

A committee of this House two years since visited Mississippi on the Vicksburgh massacre, took testimony, and made their report. They warned the country of the proposed line of conduct of the whites of that State; they exposed the organization of armed force to intimidate voters and carry elections; they prophesied precisely what has come to pass. But the cheap politicians of the northern democracy laughed at the proofs of murder, cold-blooded and designed; they raised the cry of the "bloody shirt;" they denied the sworn facts, and ridiculed the alleged combinations. Time has vindicated the truth; and Mississippi has been lost to freedom and nationality by the unsparing and murderous use of brute force.

And gentleman from the South rise here day after day and ask whether we do not know that it is their interest to treat labor kindly. Certainly it is their interest; but they are not the only people who are not wholly governed either by reason or by interest. Prejudice and passion are large factors in human life and human action. It is a man's interest and his highest duty to treat kindly his wife, the mother of his children; yet how many poor heart-broken women suffer daily agonies from all manner of brutality and abuse from their natural and legal protectors. Any day in our crowded cities you can see some human brute, whose very living depends on his horse, overload him, torture him, flog him, and in mad passion cripple and kill him. It was clearly his interest to treat him kindly, but he does not do it. And yet neither wife nor horse could provoke such evil passion as the enfranchised, perhaps defiant, slave can call up in the soured temper of the discrowned master.

It is not possible for the best of the race educated as slave-owners to bear with absolute patience the equality and perhaps the rivalry of the other. Nothing but law backed by power can muzzle these dangerous passions and force them to die off in ineffectual murmurs. And in the ordinary jurisprudence of the affected States there is no such live, effective law, and no power to sustain it.

What white man has been brought to justice for all these most miserable of all possible forms of murder? Public opinion sustains them, and they walk the streets to-day unwhiped of justice. And then, when force and violence has had its full work, when the freedom of elections has been trampled down by armed violence, when 30,000 voters have been bullied into silence in one single State, gentlemen who owe their seats in this House to these great wrongs say, behold the peace and quiet which reign in this democratic State! They remind us of the condensed sarcasm of Tacitus, "Solitudinem faciunt, pacem appellant"—they kill all opposition, and have the quiet of the grave.

Sir, the violent and forcible suppression of the popular will in any State is the highest of crimes against society and the nation. It was thus that, in Texas and Tennessee and other States in 1861, the killing without law or warrant of Union men made them harmonious in secession; and if they did not scruple to use these bloody measures on their own race and people, shall they stop now as against an intrusive people, whose presence in their midst is a badge of subjugation and a skeleton reminder of lost dominion? No, sir; the tactics so successful in Mississippi, so nearly successful in Louisiana, will assuredly be repeated this year in other States.

The horrible and cowardly butchery at Hamburgh the other day was not in itself political, but it is fatal evidence to show the temper of a large class of white people, and the slight consideration given to life when that life, God-given as it is, is incased in a black skin.

If without provocation white men troop in arms from one State into another, besiege, seize upon, and murder unoffending persons, what bounds can be set to this lust of blood when heated by the stormy appeals of partisans and fired by the passions of a great political election?

The Hamburgh murders are symptomatic and the disease they reveal is constitutional, deep-seated in the very marrow of society itself. Yet gentlemen from the North made mockery on this floor of the horrible recitals, until shamed by the bolder, braver, and more honorable denunciations of representative men from the South. I wait to see if even in South Carolina any measure of justice shall be meted out to the ruffianly crew, and not till that is done shall I believe to any great extent either in the apology or the denunciation. One honest, effective, wholesome hanging of a murderer convicted, sentenced, and executed under the law will be more convincing to me than all possible speeches on this floor or elsewhere.

One of the reasons why this republican party must live is to hold some sort of terror over the perpetrators of all this crime; for neither the past nor the present of the democracy give any hope of protection for the weak and oppressed from them. For, sir, it was democracy that denied the colored man any rights that a white man was bound to respect, and so far as it dare it does so still. It was democracy that insisted that the Constitution carried slavery into our Territories; if it dared it would say so still. It was democracy that permitted the growth and progress of the slaveholder's rebellion; that joined with them in the cry of a Union dissolvable at will; that declared the election of Lincoln cause for secession; that denied the right of coercion; that stripped the unwary nation bare of her weapons in the time of need; that proposed neutrality where it dared not fight; that denied the right of self-preservation.

It was democracy assembled in its highest sanhedrim in Chicago in 1864, after Gettysburgh and Vicksburgh, that by its special high priests, of whom Tilden was chief, declared the war a failure and insulted at once the good sense and the high courage of the people.

It was democracy which condemned the enlistment of colored troops, which denounced the proclamation of emancipation, which opposed bitterly, stubbornly, and ably the three great amendments to the Constitution, which fought them by all tactics in Congress, which fought them in State conventions and in State Legislatures, which denied and denies still that they did ever become part of the Constitution or are now the supreme law of the land.

It is this same democracy, unchanged in principles, unaltered in prejudices, full of the old passions and the old unholy traditions; less defiant than of old, because less secure, but more artful, more designing, with more of the fox and less of the lion; that is seeking again to worm its way into the confidence of the American people, and thus roll back the progress of the age, and plunge us into the bitter and dreary days that marked their last possession of national power.

A Senator the other day challenged the whole Senate to name one single creditable thing done by the democracy in twenty-five years, and the challenge remains unanswered. But you decline the past. You say it is not fair to look back or to inquire into past life. Parties, like individuals, win reputation by their lives and acts, and they cannot and should not escape from this unconscious record they have made. It is by what you have done and left undone, by your acts of commission and of omission, that judgment must pass.

As a party you died out of popular esteem and popular favor in 1860, and there was just cause. Since that time until now you have been nothing and done nothing except to hinder and complain. Your best use has been to be a drag-chain upon the triumphal wheels of the republican movement. Constructors you have never been, obstructers always. You have forgotten in this long absence from power and position all the art of government, for your whole ability has been given to detraction and finding fault. The country had a right to expect you to be awkward and clumsy in unaccustomed work, and it has not been disappointed.

You have forgotten that this country of to-day is not the country of 1830 or of 1812, and yet you try to force the mighty limbs of this centenarian giant of ours into the swaddling-bands of his infancy. You try to make this war-scarred and bearded man lisp the songs of his cradle, and dwarf the grandeur of his manly stride to the diminutive and feeble efforts of his first attempt to stand alone.

You either do not know or you choose to forget that this nation has "put away childish things;" that it has hardened into manhood; that its mighty limbs have grown strong by struggling; that its fearless eye has looked down the worst gathering of evil spirits the world has known; that its love of right has become its life; that it has power to discern, firmness to endure, and courage to overcome all evil things at home and abroad.

You forget the tremendous advances, educational, physical, and moral, that it has made since democracy died of its own inherent worthlessness. You stand, all of you, like so many Mrs. Partingtons, in mob-caps and brooms in hand, sweeping valiantly but hopelessly back the vast tide of the Atlantic. You who have never ventured over knee-deep for many years now propose to put a hook in the jaws of Leviathan.

Fresh-water sailors whose experience has been in flat-bottomed bateaux upon some muddy and shallow inland pond, you ask to man and command the ship of state in the midst of storm and peril.

For captain you propose a sleek and snug attorney, who shall bring the tactics of Tammany and the ethics of railway practice upon the quarter-deck where Lincoln stood; a cold, calculating partisan who made the most of his scoundrelly associates while they were prosperous and sold them out at a handsome profit when they fell into disrepute.

You would give the flag, symbol of the national honor, to the care of one whose narrow soul never knew the enthusiasm of patriotism.

You would give the great questions of American industry into the hands of one whose whole active life has been a successful legal robbery of all the great means of intercommunication on which industry depends.

You would give the great question of American currency into the hands of one who represents, and is represented by, the gambling element of Wall street and the foreign jobbers who have possession of our bonds—the hard creditors of the nation and the harder creditors of our people as individuals.

For first lieutenant of this old ship your proposition is dark, misty, double-faced, and uncertain. Some of us out West thought we knew him, but the waters of Saratoga and the company of Tilden have had so singular an effect on him that he might safely be made chairman of our Committee on Banking and Currency, which said committee, as you know, Mr. Speaker, is the most utterly unsolvable problem yet enunciated.

Hendricks is John Bunyan's "Mr. Facing-both-ways," and therefore supremely fitted for the Saint Louis platform.

Thus candidates and platform are equally deceptive, equally intended to deceive, and the whole programme of the approaching campaign is a speculation upon the credulity and gullibility of the American people.

It is the right and the duty of every citizen to sound the note of alarm when danger is impending; and both as individual citizen and as one of the Representatives of the people I arraign before the bar of public opinion the party, the candidates, the platform, and the democratic majority of this House. I arraign them for their bad and bitter record in the past, for their sympathy with great wrongs and their hatred to great rights. I prove them by their own words and acts as unfaithful stewards and false guardians when in power. I prove them obstinately and persistently in the way of all the great developments of individual justice and of national purification from the sins and crimes of a century. I prove them justly condemned and despised in the past of the country they betrayed; and I see them now emerging from the sackcloth and ashes of sixteen years with the same unconquered prejudice, the same lust of arbitrary dominion, the same greediness for places, the same horror and contempt for equal rights reduced to practice, with the same hollow professions and the same emptiness of results which characterized their last appearance in public history.

The great acts of the republican party stand in wonderful relief in contrast with these; for, sir, from 1860 till 1876 they were the nation, and to them as a party is due the mighty fact that we endure as a nation to-day. History cannot be obliterated; for when you strike out the record of the republican party you blot out with it the greatest glory and the greatest triumph of the country.

Strong in the past, secure of full appreciation for things well done, that party stands to-day rooted in the affections of millions of people, and by reason of its high and honorable course in the times of anguish and trial has won a reputation which makes its promises of value and gives assurance of the full and honest redemption of all its engagements to the people.

TARIFF AND INTERNAL REVENUE.

Mr. HENKLE addressed the House upon the subject of the tariff and the internal-revenue system. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

TERRITORY OF PEMBINA.

Mr. KIDDER. Mr. Speaker, never in the history of this Government has the attention of the people been so profoundly awakened to the interests of its frontiers. The terrible news from the Black Hills country, the slaughter of a major-general, five colonels, twenty-two commissioned officers, and over three hundred gallant soldiers, has almost stopped pulsation in the American heart. Historians will pause in the writing of this epoch in our history and tremble as they attempt to record the horrible story. Fiat justitia cœlum ruat. It is at this eventful period of our national history that I now ask the earnest consideration of Congress to this bill. A bill for this purpose has been before Congress five years, and it has been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Territories three times. The consideration of this bill at this moment presents an opportunity not to be neglected by one careful of the welfare of his country and mindful of the perpetuity of republican institutions.

Encroachments on the outposts are always vigilantly repulsed by the skillful commander, and are no less the study of a thoughtful statesman. Had wise warnings from distinguished Senators and Representatives from our West been heeded, the disasters of this day, bringing shame burning to the cheek of each member of this Republic, would not have occurred. Instead of prairies running to waste, great Territories would be in existence, and in place of scalping savages, a brotherhood of Americans.

It is said that some unknown hand many years ago carved on a rock at Plymouth near where the Pilgrims landed the lines:

> The eastern nations fade, their glory ends,
> And empire rises where the sun descends.

The sentiment was but a paraphrase of Bishop Berkeley's lines which have been quoted so often as to become hackneyed:

> Westward the course of empire takes its way.

The gift of prophecy is given to few among mortals, and it is doubtful if the good bishop or the unknown carver on the granite cliff realized the truth of the idea. We at this later day, standing in the centennial year of the great Republic, may feel its force, but not realize the power that this nation shall possess when the vast area west of the Mississippi shall be thronged by the multitudes which its fertile soil and mighty stores of the precious metals have "awaited through the centuries."

The founders of the Republic dreamed not of the brilliant future that awaited their descendants. When Boston was first laid out commissioners were appointed, so say the records, to make a road to the West. In due time they reported that they had marked out a road westward six miles, which was as far "as ever would be required."

Even in 1803, when the purchase of the great territory of Louisiana was under discussion, the territory which then stretched from the Mississippi to the Pacific Ocean, the statesmen of the infant Republic seem to have been in doubt whether the lands beyond the Mississippi would ever be of value to us. Those who read the debates in Congress on that point will find that it was asserted on this floor that our settlements would not be extended beyond the Mississippi River in perhaps five hundred years.

Our political history is most beautifully illustrated by the following facts:

ORGANIZATION OF TERRITORIES.

The territory of the United States, outside of the portion occupied by the original thirteen States, consisted in 1787 of "territory northwest of the river Ohio," which extended west to the Mississippi; in 1790, of the above and "territory south of the river Ohio;" in 1798 and to 1812, besides the above, the "Mississippi Territory;" in 1803, besides the above, the "Province of Louisiana;" (which extended from the Gulf of Mexico and the Mississippi River to the Pacific Ocean in the Northwest;) in 1819, besides the above, the "Spanish cession," (Florida;) in 1848, besides the above, the several "Mexican cessions," (extending west to the Pacific;) and in 1853, in addition, the "Gadsden purchase," south of the last before named. These, with Alaska, purchased of Russia in 1868, were never organized, with governments, but from time to time territorial or State forms were given to portions of them.

Indiana, formed as a Territory from the territory northwest of the Ohio, act of May 7, 1800.

By act of March 26, 1804, the "Province of Louisiana" was divided into the "Territory of Orleans" and the "District of Louisiana." The government of the latter was committed to the officers of the Territory of Indiana. By act of March 3, 1805, the District of Louisiana was organized as the Territory of Louisiana; and by act of June 4, 1812, the same was re-organized as the Territory of Missouri.

Michigan, by act of January 11, 1805, was formed as a Territory from the Territory of Indiana.

Illinois, by act of February 3, 1809, was formed a Territory from the Territory of Indiana.

Alabama, by act of March 3, 1817, was formed as a Territory from the Territory of Mississippi.

Arkansas, by act of March 2, 1819, formed as the Arkansas Territory from Territory of Missouri.

Florida, by act of March 30, 1822, formed as a Territory from the territory ceded by Spain.

The Indian country or territory is not an organized political division of the United States.

Wisconsin, by act of April 20, 1836, formed as a Territory out of lands acquired by treaty with Great Britain and the French cession.

Iowa, by act of June 12, 1838, formed as a Territory from the Territory of Wisconsin.

Oregon, by act of August 14, 1848, formed as a Territory out of the French cession.

Minnesota, by act of March 3, 1849, formed as a Territory out of land east of the Mississippi ceded by Great Britain.

Utah, by act of September 9, 1850, formed as a Territory.

New Mexico, by act of September 9, 1850, formed as a Territory.

Washington, by act of March 2, 1853, formed as a Territory from Territory of Oregon.

Kansas, by act of May 30, 1854, formed as a Territory.

Nebraska, by act of May 30, 1854, formed as a Territory from the then Territory of Minnesota.

Colorado, by act of February 28, 1861, formed as a Territory from the Territory of Kansas.

Nevada, by act of March 2, 1861, formed as a Territory from parts of California and Utah.

Dakota, by act of March 2, 1861, formed as a Territory from a part of the original Territory of Nebraska and all the Territory of Minnesota remaining after the erection of the State of Minnesota.

Arizona, by act of February 24, 1863, formed as a Territory from the western part of the Territory of New Mexico.

Idaho, by act of March 3, 1863, formed as a Territory. It has been contained in the Territories of Oregon, Washington, Nebraska, Dakota, Utah, and has had Montana taken from it.

Montana, by act of May 26, 1864, formed as a Territory from the northwestern part of Idaho.

Wyoming, by act of July 25, 1868, formed as a Territory from portions of Utah, Dakota, and Idaho.

Alaska, (not a political division,) ceded by Russia in 1868.

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

The Territory of Dakota contains 150,932 square miles. Pembina will contain 72,930 square miles. It will extend from the seventh standard parallel, which is about eleven miles south of the forty-sixth degree, to the British possessions and from the Red River of the North to the Yellowstone.

It has within its borders six hundred miles of navigable waters on the Red River, more than six hundred on the Missouri, and over three hundred on the Yellowstone, and in all over two thousand miles of navigable rivers.

Two lines of steamers ply regularly on the Red River and fleets of flatboats run in connection with the Manitoba traffic. Five lines of steamers are operating on the Missouri, with a tonnage of several millions pounds. A line of steamers also is intended to be put on to the Yellowstone this season, if Congress will permit the opening of the Yellowstone region.

Already two hundred miles of railroad are in operation in the proposed Territory and arrangements for extension across the Territory have been made. Other roads are also projected, particularly the Chicago and Northwestern, which is already completed to Lake Kampeska and will terminate probably at Bismarck.

The population of the proposed territory is not less than twelve thousand, and I am confident that it will now largely exceed that number.

The vote of that region in 1874 was over fifteen hundred, but there were many localities where no polls were opened, and the country being sparsely settled many had no opportunity for voting.

The population is largely made up of farmers and in all parts of the territory farming operations are being carried on successfully.

No country in the world is superior to the Red River region for agricultural purposes. Enormous crops of wheat, oats, and corn are there produced. The wheat crop of the Red River the present season will not be less than half a million bushels. One man there has 10,000 acres of wheat growing in one field at the present time; others have, respectively, a thousand and more; very many have the usual number, a hundred acres, and so on down.

The Red River is well timbered, and many streams also well timbered empty into it, while heavy bodies of timber are found on the Cheyenne and its tributaries. The James (Dakota) River, having less timber, is well adapted to agriculture, and is already settling rapidly. Thousands will find valuable locations along its waters, affording timber, water, and the best prairie land I have ever seen. Between the Dakota and Missouri Rivers coteaux will be found, and they consist largely of gravel knolls; and while even here much valuable land is found, there is a disposition to condemn the whole country because these are within its borders. They are but thirty miles in length and the breadth of the Territory is four hundred.

The country west of the Missouri in the main is better than that east of it, excepting perhaps the Red River Valley which cannot be excelled for beauty and richness anywhere. It is watered by the Heart, Little Heart, Sweet Water, Little Missouri, the Cannon Ball, Dancing Bear, Big Knife, and scores of tributaries to these streams, all more or less timbered, while heavy bodies of cottonwood, oak, ash, and elm are found on the Missouri.

The Bad Lands, of which much has been said, are exceedingly limited in extent, and are represented in beds of old streams, the bottoms of lakes, or at points where alkaline deposits have accumulated. In the proposed Territory at the point where crossed by the North Pacific Railroad they are but five miles in extent, instead of covering half of the Territory, as some have represented. East of the Missouri there is not a foot of these bad lands.

The entire Territory is well adapted to grazing; nutritious grasses grow luxuriantly, and good water is found in abundance.

Immense beds of gypsum and coal are found on the Missouri, and west of the Missouri gold and silver, the former within a few miles of Bismarck.

Though the Black Hills country is situated south of Pembina, the mineral region extends north and west, and already exceedingly rich diggings have been found on the line of the North Pacific.

This portion of Dakota is isolated from the southern portion of the Territory and has but little communication with it, and there is but little common sympathy between the two sections.

Northern Dakota seems to be identified in interest with Minnesota and Wisconsin, Du Luth and Milwaukee being its lake ports, while Southern Dakota is identified with Nebraska and Iowa, Chicago being its market.

Persons desiring to reach Yankton, the capital of the Territory, from Northern Dakota, except during a few months in summer, are forced to go via Saint Paul and Sioux City, Iowa, traveling a thousand miles or more, as there is no communication between the two except a military road leading up the Missouri. And in cases of deep snow, when the roads leading south from Minnesota are blockaded, the trip is frequently made via Chicago. The members of the Legislature from Northern Dakota in 1873 actually drew, and were entitled to it, mileage from Bismarck to Yankton via Chicago, a distance of about sixteen hundred miles.

In summer-time even via the river from the settlements in Pembina to the capital of Dakota the distance is from eight hundred and fifty to twelve hundred and fifty miles.

Justice has been defeated in many instances because the parties were not able to pursue the adversary to the capital of the Territory.

The expenses of United States officers and of witnesses traveling to and from the capital is immense, and in this item alone much can be saved to apply toward the extra expenses of the new Territory.

We have many precedents of the organization of Territories before us with a less population than this has. Mississippi was organized with a population of only 8,850; Indiana, 5,641; Michigan, 4,000; Wisconsin, 7,000; Minnesota, 6,077; Washington, 1,201; Dakota, 4,837; Nebraska, 6,857; Arizona, 5,000; and Wyoming two years after its organization (1870) had a population of only 9,318.

The average annual expenses of a territorial government in the United States is $27,463.83. Each has biennial sessions. Every other year, then, the expense is only about one-half of this sum.

Land offices are located at Fargo and Bismarck; United States courts are holden at Pembina, Fargo, and Bismarck; and four newspapers are published in the contemplated Territory.

RESULTS OF A TERRITORIAL ORGANIZATION.

The development and growth of this Territory, under an organization, will tend to add greatly to the wealth of the Government, and in a few years in emigration will be thereby so increased, and the expenses thereof will be so effectually eclipsed by gain, that this Government of ours, in a pecuniary point of view, will be the winner in the transaction.

The careful attention of the people of our land is now directed to that portion of the West where property and life are so insecure by reason of the conduct of the Sioux Indians and their affiliated bands. It behooves this Congress especially to meet promptly and firmly the demands coming in every direction west of the Mississippi. The days of appeal are passed, the moment for action has arrived, and I claim in behalf of the people I represent in the very heart of the troubles and dangers such action on this bill as will guarantee to the settlers future security. How can we ask emigrants to expose themselves to the manifold horrors and dangers unless we present to them some guarantees?

Treaty guarantees have been proven false and deceptive, and the only trusty anchor of hope is the establishment of territorial governments, and none is at present before you but this of Pembina. The Territory established, this fertile section would soon be developed, the land occupied by sturdy sons of toil, its many navigable waters would be covered by fast-sailing vessels and steamers, villages, towns, and cities would spring into existence, presenting obstacles to Indian forays more insuperable than cavalry or infantry; capital would be employed in finishing the railroads already established and commenced, linking the far West to the East "in links stronger than steel." Time forbids me more than to allude to the wonderful geographical barrier known as the Couteau des Prairies, which separates Pembina from Southern Dakota, a natural plateau starting at the Missouri River and extending to the extreme western boundary, presenting a southern face of from five hundred to fifteen hundred feet in height, and which can only be overcome by the intrepid voyageur or by long detours of travelers, costing for members of the Legislature, judges, witnesses, and others who from official duties are compelled to visit Yankton, the capital, nearly as much annually as the expenses of the proposed Territory. The fertility of the country is known to those who have visited it.

The proposed Territory is well wooded; and, under the security of a territorial government, the day is not distant when searchers for health and pleasure will seek the salubrious climate and health-giving springs of the Territory of Pembina instead of foreign climes and braving the dangers and miseries of a tempestuous ocean.

Congress has just added Colorado, a brilliant star, to the constellation of States. Again let her entwine the centennial wreath around the crest of a new Territory, and Pembina in a few short years will be added to that gorgeous cluster as one of the brightest jewels which now so magnificently adorns the American Union.

REPEAL OF NATIONAL BANKING LAW.

Mr. LAPHAM. Mr. Speaker, a paper currency of some description may justly be regarded as a necessity in a commercial country like ours. The great object to be attained is to make and maintain such paper, as near as is practicable, on a par with gold and silver, and convertible at all times into coin, on demand, at the pleasure of the holder. Prior to 1861 the general demand for such paper was supplied by bills of the Bank of the United States and of the banks in the several States. A controversy or question arose as early as 1832 as to the legality of State banks of issue, it being claimed by the opponents of the system that they were in violation of the Constitution of the United States, which prohibits to the States the right to emit bills of credit. The question came before the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Craig and others vs. The State of Missouri, 4 Peters, 410. The court in effect, as was claimed, gave such an interpretation to the Constitution as necessarily to render void all issues of circulating notes by banks organized under State laws. Chief Justice Marshall was then living and took part in the decision of the case. The Bank of the United States was then in existence and struggling for a re-charter against the most violent opposition on the part of the democratic party under the leadership of President Jackson. The efforts of Jackson and his followers were finally successful; the Bank of the United States was overthrown, its recharter defeated, and the country was left without any other paper circulation than that furnished by the State banks. In this condition of affairs the struggle to maintain the validity and constitutionality of State banks was renewed, and about the year 1836 or 1837 the case of Briscoe against the State Bank of Kentucky was brought before the Supreme Court of the United States. It was an action on a promissory note or bill of exchange, for which the State bank had given its own notes or bills on a discount, and the defense was that the bills of the State bank were unconstitutional and void and the note without consideration. Chief Justice Marshall had died in the mean time. But Judge Story, who also took part in the decision of Craig vs. The State of Missouri, was still a member of the court. By a divided court the doctrine of the case first cited was discarded and held not applicable to the case at bar. Judge Story, however, dissented from the views of the majority, and in one of his most masterly opinions, after paying a great tribute to the memory of the Chief Justice, he showed the fallacy of the reasoning of the majority and deeply deprecated the possibility of it being ever said of that court that it had changed the rule of a decision once deliberately made. To any one curious enough to investigate, the latter case is well worth his attention, and especially the opinion of Judge Story. (11 Peters, 257.)

The constitutionality of State banks being thus settled, those who are old enough will remember and the younger have heard or read, that a flood of bank paper was showered upon the country within the next two years, some having a partially sound basis and more having no solid basis on which to rest. The "wild-cat" system of the then young State of Michigan was a fair sample. Bank issues ran riot all over the country, and the result was what might have been expected, at first a stimulus of prices and business, succeeded by a collapse, the banks not being able to redeem their paper; and one of the commercial revulsions to which I shall hereafter refer was the inevitable consequence.

This kind of currency, with varying fortunes, continued to furnish the circulating medium of the country until after the opening of the war of the rebellion.

It was soon found it was wholly inadequate to the wants of the Government either in quality or quantity, the banks having all suspended specie payments and having curtailed their circulation as far as possible. In this emergency the first issue of greenbacks was resorted to as a necessary war measure; and in order to insure the success of the new currency it was found to be absolutely necessary to impart to it the legal-tender quality. With this the Government met the demands of the hour and was enabled to prosecute the war to its happy termination. One of the great problems of the present is, what shall be done with this outstanding issue of legal-tender notes? They are a source of national disgrace and humiliation at present. They are dishonored every hour which they exist. They are an obstacle and a clog in the way of the advancement of the bills of national banks to the specie standard. As the law now stands, the Government is to begin their redemption on the 1st of January, 1879. Surely this is none too soon. If in the mean time they can be funded and put in the form of a bonded debt at a low rate of interest, which may be the basis of banking under the national act, the problem will have been wisely solved. In some way they must be disposed of before we can hope for a sound and healthy state of the currency. I have said they are the outgrowth of the war. So was the United States Bank. It was chartered in 1816, just after the close of the second war with Great Britain. Speaking of that institution, Senator Benton, in one of his earnest philippics, said:

> The war made the bank. Peace shall unmake it. The baleful planet of fire and blood and every human woe did bring the pestilence upon us. The benignant star of peace shall chase it away.

So, sir, I say of the greenbacks. They have fulfilled their office, which was but temporary. They are not adapted to the present time of peace unless we are prepared to adopt such issue as the permanent paper system of the country and to abolish the national banking act, leaving nothing but issues of Government paper for the use of the American people. This proposal, now made in the name of men who profess to be the disciples of Jackson, is one which strikes even a casual observer with amazement. The great evil of which the democracy complained in the conduct by the United States Bank was its interference in the politics of the country. By an overissue it could make money plenty and business prosperous, and by a sudden curtailment of its circulation could produce distress and create a panic in order to alarm the people. It was shown that in six months it expanded its circulation six millions of dollars—more than a hundred millions would affect the business of the country now—and in six months more it contracted its issues and withdrew its circulation to an equal amount, thus exercising a controlling and deleterious influence upon the rights of the people. All depended upon the will of the directors. Borrowing the figure from ancient mythology, Senator Benton, in the discussion to which I have referred, said:

> All will depend upon the will of the supreme central directory, who, sitting upon their tripods and waving their tridents over the moneyed ocean, could raise and depress the golden waves at pleasure.

So it will be under an exclusively greenback system. The administration in power will have the control of the purse-strings of the nation. The discretion must necessarily be given to the Secretary of the Treasury or some other officer or officers of the Government to decide upon the amount of bills to be issued and kept outstanding at any given period. It is no answer to this position to say that Congress may prescribe the limit beyond which the issue shall not be expanded. Within that limit the control could be exercised and even an issue beyond such limit would be justified by some supposed or alleged necessity and would undoubtedly receive the sanction of Congress as a party measure. The history of the use already made of what are known as the legal-tender reserves is instructive upon this point. For one, Mr. Speaker, I will never consent to lodge this dangerous power in the hands of any administration, however pure.

The system provided for by the national-banking act in my judgment furnishes the true solution of the currency question. With all the advantages of the Bank of the United States; a currency of equal value all over the United States, it avoids all the evils and dangers which were imputed to that bank. In comparison with a system of State banks a most wonderful and favorable contrast is presented. Under the system of State banks, exchange between New Orleans or San Francisco and New York often reached as high as 6 per cent. The bills of the State banks were of no practical use beyond State lines. It was necessary for persons traveling from State to State to submit to a ruinous discount or to procure gold and silver in advance. To the laboring classes it was an especial burden. Every laboring-man was obliged to supply himself with the monthly issues of bank-note lists and counterfeit detectors with which the land was flooded, and as often as he was paid his wages to consult the same in order to discover whether he had not been imposed upon by a bill of a broken or discredited bank. How is it now? The millions who have this afternoon received their pay did not look to see or care whether the bills with which they were paid were issued by a bank in Maine or Texas. It was enough that they had on them the signet of the Government of the United States, and to have the assurance they could thereby receive them in safety. There has never been a period when so much of the paper money of the country was hoarded in private hands as at present. It is received with the same confidence as gold and silver were formerly.

And, sir, there is safety, absolute safety, to the bill-holder in taking and holding the paper issued by the national banks. I would make the system free to all. I would authorize any man or company who furnished the requisite Government securities to receive for circulation the national-bank notes. The law of supply and demand, the commercial necessities of the hour in any section or locality would then regulate the volume of the currency. This would not be open to the objection which existed against the free-banking systems of the States. Take the State of New York for example. A person or company desiring to organize a bank could deposit with the comptroller State securities or bonds and mortgages as the basis upon which bills were issued. So far as State securities were used there was no danger and no loss. But the securities by bond and mortgage proved in the end very delusive. Titles failed, lands were overvalued, and in various ways it was found that banks so organized were only stupendous frauds, so that in many cases the bill-holders suffered an almost total loss. No such danger is incident to the national banking system.

As I have said, the bills are received with the confidence they are safe. The bank-note list and counterfeit detector, once so common, have become obsolete literature. Those who choose to deposit their moneys in national banks will of course do so at their peril as to whether their confidence is well placed or misplaced. It will be so under any system. There will always be individuals or companies to receive deposits. It would be so if the Government issued all the money and there were no banks. Each depositor lends his money subject to call on demand or on a notice of thirty or sixty days, as may be agreed, but the loan is made on the confidence the depositor has in the responsibility and integrity of the person or company with whom he makes such deposits. It is in no way connected with, nor does it affect, the banking system so far as the security of the bill-holder is concerned. With the dishonored promises of the Government out of the way by funding them as I have suggested or by their redemption, I do not see why in six months the issue of national-bank notes would not approximate as near the gold standard as paper money will ever reach. A nominal difference of from 1 to 3 per cent. has always existed and will doubtless continue to exist. But with the right of the holder at any time to demand coin for such bills and with suitable provisions as to their redemption, no paper issue has ever been found superior to that of the national banks.

Mr. Speaker, the commercial revulsions of 1837, 1857, and 1873 furnish an instructive lesson on this subject. Who that is old enough does not remember that in 1837 and in 1857 the first to feel the pulsation and to exhibit signs of distress was the paper money in the hands of the people. It was at once subjected to a ruinous discount or could not be used at all. The people were found with it unavailable on their hands, and distress and ruin were the consequences.

How was it in 1873? There was no depreciation of the currency. The national-bank notes were sought after as eagerly as ever, and, as I have said, more money is hoarded in private hands than ever before. Large houses failed by reason of their imprudence. A general distrust seemed to lay hold of the public mind; but there was and is no distrust of or lack of faith in the currency, and those who kept out of debt while prices were inflated by the events of the war have not been sufferers by what is termed the financial disaster of 1873.

I trust therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the policy adopted to commence the redemption of the legal-tenders on the 1st of January, 1879, unless sooner funded and disposed of, will be adhered to with the most unswerving fidelity. It is the only way to preserve the national honor and to promote the national credit. If I am not mistaken, France has fixed a period a year earlier than we have at which to resume specie payments, although her debt was contrated after ours.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that this subject as well as all others connected with general legislation seem to be looked upon at this time mainly in their political aspects. The majority in the House have been free in their imputations upon the minority that they do not want to legislate for the people, but for the bondholders; that they do not want economy, but rather favor extravagance and waste in the matter of appropriations. You are not in favor of economy and retrenchment. You profess to be, but when it comes to the test you vote against it, says the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.] I do not quote his words, but give the substance. "In the name of the whole people, in the name of honest men everywhere, I protest in one word against the whole body of that (the republican) side of the House as wanting in fair, square economy," exclaims the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX;] and he added, with that inimitable humor and sarcasm which always grace his oratory when excited: "Put that in your pipe and smoke it for the next election." As this was said the last of January and the "next election" was that in New Hampshire, we smoked to some purpose.

But from whom do these wholesale charges come? From gentlemen who, as members of the minority in past years, as the records prove, almost uniformly favored the largest expenditures and the most lavish appropriations; one of whom by a provision attached to the tail end of the general appropriation bill helped himself to all the "law allowed" out of the Treasury, and the other represents the city of New York, where in the last ten years the democracy have rolled up a debt of uncounted millions, compared with which the debt of this city, about which we have heard so much during the session, is a mere bagatelle. Why, Mr. Speaker, if you want to draw a contrast between democratic and republican economy in practice—not in profession—you need only go to the city in part represented by the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.] At the north end of the park is the New York court-house, not yet completed, and which has already cost over $16,000,000! At the south end of the same park is the new post-office and court-house for the United States, a far more imposing and more costly structure of the two, as any observer can readily notice, and yet the latter has not yet cost quite $3,000,000. But I will not pursue this subject further.

Mr. Speaker, the evils we hear complained of on every hand cannot be cured by legislative enactments alone. The sooner the people learn this important lesson the sooner they will avail themselves of the remedy they need. Too many, far too many are anxiously looking to the Government as the only source from which relief can come. It will at last be found, or mainly found in other directions:

> Even now, in passing through the garden walk,
> Upon the ground I saw a fallen nest
> Ruined and full of rain; and over me
> Beheld the uncomplaining birds already > Busy in building a new habitation.

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the example for our imitation. Let us go to the birds and the ants as well and be wise. Productive industry and not cunning legislation is the panacea for the evils from which we are suffering. The most that legislation can do is to guard and protect such industry and to aid in directing it in its proper channels. And the brightest laurel we can win is in so protecting and directing it as to keep untarnished the faith and honor and to preserve from blight the credit of the nation.

MISSISSIPPI LEVEES.

Mr. YOUNG addressed the House upon the subject of the Mississippi levees. [His speech will appear in the Appendix]

ELECTION OF TERRITORIAL OFFICERS.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on the Territories, of the Forty-fourth Congress, has taken a step in reference to the government of the Territories which will secure for it the gratitude and grateful remembrance of the people of the several Territories, whose interests, so far as national legislation is concerned, are committed to its keeping. That committee has recognized the right of the people of the Territories to a voice in the choice of their own officers and the duty of Congress to provide by new legislation for giving expression to that voice, and on the 18th day of the present month reported to this House, with a favorable recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 3207) to provide for the election of territorial officers in the several Territories of the United States. The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the following officers for each of the several Territories (who shall hold their respective offices for two years and until their successors are elected and qualified) shall hereafter be elected by the qualified voters of each of said Territories: a governor, secretary, territorial treasurer, territorial auditor, and superintendent of schools. The term of office of each of the above-named officers shall commence upon the first Monday in January after their election; and the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in the year 1876 is established as the day of holding the first election under this act; and the Tuesday next after the first Monday in November in every second year thereafter is established as the day for holding all subsequent elections. All votes for said officers must be by written or printed ballots, and shall be cast and counted and the result declared under such regulations as may be provided by law; but the first election herein provided for shall be held under the laws as they may exist in the several Territories governing the election of Delegates to Congress at the date of said election. But this section shall not apply to Territories hereafter to be formed until Congress by special act shall so decide.

SEC. 2. That the qualifications and duties of such territorial treasurers, auditors, and superintendents of schools shall be declared by the legislative assemblies of the several Territories; but nothing herein contained shall in any manner change or impair the duties, rights, powers, and obligations of the governors and secretaries of the several Territories as they are now, or may hereafter be, provided for by act of Congress, except so far as the manner of their selection and their term of office are hereby changed.

SEC. 3. That the President may at any time, for good cause, remove either the governor or secretary of any Territory, and, with the consent of the Senate, appoint a successor to hold his office during the unexpired term of the person removed; and the cause of any such removal shall be communicated by the President to the Senate at the next succeeding session thereof; and the President, by the consent of the Senate, may fill all vacancies in the office of governor or secretary occasioned by death or resignation, and in such event the appointee shall hold his office during the unexpired term of the officer who has died or resigned.

Representing as I do one of the Territories, it is hardly necessary for me to say that this bill meets my hearty and cordial approval. Especially am I interested in the question, having had the honor to introduce in both the present and the Forty-third Congress a bill giving to the people of the Territories the right to elect their own officers. And although the present bill does not go to the extent which is desirable, in my opinion, in allowing to the people the right to elect their judicial officers, it is a very great measure of relief to grant to the Territories the right of election of governor and secretary and of their own local officials; and on behalf of the people I have the honor to represent I desire to return to the Committee on the Territories grateful thanks for their recognition of our right to "home rule and local self-government" even to the extent done by the pending bill.

The bill allows the people of each of the Territories to elect biennially a governor and secretary, in place of their being appointed by the President, and also allows the election of an auditor, treasurer, and superintendent of schools, they being officials whose offices are created by act of the territorial Legislatures and whose salaries and compensation are paid by the people of the Territories, but whom under the "organic acts" of the Territories it has been decided cannot be elected by the people, but are to be appointed by the governor with the consent of the legislative council; so that the only change proposed in the existing law which interests the House and Congress is the proposition to allow the people to elect their governor and secretary, instead of their being as now appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and to this extent allowing the people of the several Territories to choose their officers from their own citizens.

Mr. Speaker, in a government which rests upon such principles as does our own any measure proposing to increase the rights and liberties of the citizen or citizens in their aggregate capacity merits and should receive the profound and careful consideration of the Congress of the United States. More especially should this be the case when such increase of personal and political right can be granted and guaranteed without change of the fundamental law of the land and without invasion of any rights either of the Union or the States.

I have listened with great pleasure, and not, I hope, without profit, to the eloquence that has resounded through this Hall during the present session in reference to this "centennial year of the Republic." And I doubt not that we have all felt our hearts beat faster and our hope and pride in our common country rise higher as, burying all past differences and sectional animosities, members from all portions of our country, representing the honest and loyal sentiments of honest and loyal constituencies, have expressed their hope in and devotion to the Union of the States and its perpetuity, and that all men who can divest themselves of the extreme prejudice which blinds reason feel that, the exciting cause of the past differences being removed, we are nearer than ever to the realization of the hope for "one country, one flag, and one destiny."

It is well for us in this year to look back to the principles upon which this Government was founded and see what it was that caused the feeble colonies to throw off the government of the mother country and lay in suffering, privation, and blood the foundation of this great Republic; and it would be well for all to see that the principles lying at the foundation of our political fabric are not violated in this land in this centennial year.

Sir, what was it that led to the revolt of the colonies? Without going into familiar and tedious detail of the long struggle of the colonies to maintain their charters and liberties, the main-spring of all their action may be said to have been—

No taxation without representation and a demand for the right of local self-government.

The first congress of the colonies met October 7, 1765, in the city of New York, and on the 19th of that month published the "Declaration of rights," article 2 of which declared—

That His Majesty's liege subjects in these colonies are entitled to all the inherent rights and liberties of his natural-born subjects within the Kingdom of Great Britain.

Article 3 protested against the right of taxation without representation.

The immortal Declaration of Independence, in which the colonies made their appeal to the judgment of mankind, announces it to be a self-evident truth—

That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. That to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed.

It is now one hundred years since this great declaration of human rights was formulated; and it would be well to ask ourselves, Is there within the limits of the Republic any system of government established by the Congress which violates the principles upon which this Government was established? Have the United States any colonies; if so, are the people of the colonies denied the right of local self-government and subjected to taxation without representation; and do the governments of the colonies derive their just powers from the consent of the governed?

And if these questions should be answered so as to show that the territorial plan of government violates the fundamental principles of our system of goverment; that the Territories are essentially colonies and under a pro-consular system of government, in which the right of local self-government is denied; that there is taxation without representation; and that the territorial governments do not derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, it would seem to be the duty of Congress to devise some method of governing the Territories which should give to those colonies the largest liberty of self-government consistent with the safety of the Republic.

Sir, the United States have colonies, and those colonies are the organized Territories of the United States, which are to-day, with some slight changes of detail, governed substantially upon the same principles as the American colonies were prior to the Revolution.

The ordinance of 1787 "for the government of the territory of the United States northwest of the river Ohio" continues with but few changes the basis of the plan for the government of the Territories. This system may have answered the necessities of the people when Territories were soon admitted as States and the period of vassalage was short; but the basis of representation is rapidly increasing and the objection to admitting new States with small populations is growing stronger, and some new system of governing the Territories should be devised by which during the years that they are kept in their territorial condition they shall be allowed the fullest right of local self-government, with the right of election of their executive and judicial officers. When these rights shall be granted the people of the Territories the demand for admission as States until fully entitled and prepared for admission to the Union will cease, strife and dissension in the Territories will end, and they will enter upon careers of progress, prosperity, and development unexampled in our history and impossible under our present system.

But it will be said, "How are all these great results to be obtained by simply giving the people of the Territories the right of election of their own officers;" and the answer is that you will give the people a government of their own, elected by and responsible to them, identified with them in interest, which they will honor and respect.

The history (but recent) of the reconstruction measures in the Southern States demonstrates that there can be no accord between our American people and those sent to rule over them, or selected in any method except by the choice of the people themselves; that they will not affiliate with men who have no sympathies or other interests in common with the people they are appointed to rule over, and who possess neither the respect nor the confidence of their unfortunate subjects. The people of the South had been used to the selection of their own officials, and any system which deprived them of that right naturally excited the antipathy and resistance of those who thought themselves deprived of rights which they believed of right they ought to exercise. The consequence of the plan pursued was anarchy, disorder, plunder, and misgovernment, which is to be attributed to the character and conduct of the officials sent to the South more than to any other cause.

Nor is it different in the Territories. Our people are American citizens, used to the exercise of the rights so dear to all. They emigrate to the Territories not because they are the drones of the body-politic, but very largely because they are the most enterprising and ambitious of the people, and they see no good reason why their enterprise should be punished by deprivation of political rights, unless it be for the crime of aiding to develop the national domain and carrying American civilization into the wilderness. If I am competent as a citizen of one of the States to vote for governor and judges, does my removal to one of the Territories make me any less competent to wisely choose those officers?

Mr. Speaker, I venture to assert that there is not one Territory where to-day there is not dissatisfaction and open quarrel with the Federal officials; they are not of the people, not identified with them in interest, nor possessing their confidence and respect. They come as aliens and strangers to perform the duties of their offices and to remain only so long as they continue to hold their positions, often seeking to subserve their own selfish personal ends rather than the good of the people and the progress and development of the Territory. Thus feuds, jealousies, and personal quarrels arise, tending to make discord and disturbance, and seriously interfering with the peace, harmony, progress, and prosperity of people and Territory.

The present system of appointment of territorial officers is vicious, unrepublican, and un-American. It is one of the grandest features of our republican system of government, that all power comes from the people and that no officer is absolved from accountability and responsibility to the people. But this most wholesome provision has no applicability to the Territories. A governor and secretary are appointed, not because the people want them, but because they are to be repaid for some political service. Often lacking every essential qualification for the position, they become obnoxious to the people. But what matters that and to what purpose do the people protest and pray for a change? They owe no allegiance to the people, and the political influence which secured their appointment is but too often willing to keep them in place against the will of the people, irrespective of party.

The Federal patronage in the Territories, which it would be necessary to surrender in order to guarantee to them the rights given by the pending bill, would only be two appointees in each Territory, to wit, one governor and one secretary.

I assert and believe that the present system of government in the Territories is essentially bad and vicious; it is unrepublican. The governments do not derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and the fundamental principles upon which our system of government is founded are violated by the system of government which has been established for the Territories.

Whenever new States have been admitted, with but one exception, as soon as released from territorial vassalage they have rapidly increased in population and prosperity, while they languished as Territories. So soon as endowed with sovereignty and the right of governing themselves they have made such progress as was impossible while in their territorial condition. With officers of their own choice, identified with them in interest, with the right of self-government, with the cessation of strife between people and imported office-holders, they have entered upon careers of progress and prosperity which have been the wonder and admiration of the world.

It is unnecessary to inquire under what section of the Constitution Congress obtains the right to govern the Territories. It is sufficient that the power exists and is unquestioned, but the form and method of government prescribed or to be prescribed rests in the judgment and wisdom of the Congress; and, without questioning the power, we simply ask that Congress, in the exercise of its high prerogative of providing government of a temporary character for the Territories, shall revise the present system in favor of home rule and local self-government and of increased personal and political right to the people of the Territories. There is no provision of the Constitution which prohibits or prevents Congress giving to the people the largest liberty of self-government and control, and the spirit of the Constitution and of our system of government demand the largest liberty to the citizen consistent with the safety of the Government itself.

But it is objected by some that the population of the Territories is small, and therefore that it makes but little difference whether the people are unjustly governed or not. Yet our declaration of rights holds that man possesses certain inalienable rights. If this be so, each citizen in his own right possesses certain privileges, the right to exercise which is inherent in him, and does not depend upon the number of citizens who may be aggregated together. The right of the people of a Territory to govern themselves should not depend upon the question of whether it contains a population of 50,000 or of 100,000; for under our system of government the citizen is entitled as of right to local self-government. Congress possesses the power to impose upon the Territories a colonial form of government and to disfranchise them, but I deny its moral right to deprive the humblest citizen of his inherent and guaranteed rights except on conviction for crime; and more especially do I deny the moral right of Congress to deprive entire communities of the dearest and most sacred rights of American citizenship. The exercise of these rights can in no just sense be made to depend upon the number of citizens who may be aggregated together within certain geographical limits. If it does so depend, where is the limit and what the number where servitude and vassalage end and freedom and citizenship commence?

When the colonies asserted their independence the best authorities estimate their population at about three millions; and yet at the end of a century we find in our own land one-sixth as many people, or in all the Territories about five hundred thousand people, with a property valuation of from $125,000,000 to $150,000,000 and with an annual mineral production alone valued at about $25,000,000, disfranchised and deprived of some of the most valuable rights of citizenship.

It is frequently said, If you do not desire to be deprived of those rights of citizenship, why do you go to the Territories? This is as ungracious as illogical. Because a system of government is bad we should not be precluded from agitating for a change; and as the development, prosperity, and progress of the Territories add to the wealth and prosperity of a common country, our people should be encouraged in opening up and developing the great national domain, which is but in the infancy of the development of its almost boundless resources, and should not be discouraged from engaging in such a work by the thought that they will be punished for emigrating to and developing the great West by loss of the rights which every true American citizen believes to be his proudest heritage.

The nature of the public domain open to settlement has changed since the country from which the great States of the Northwest and Southwest was formed has been settled and occupied. The rich prairies settled so rapidly, that the territorial governments were in fact temporary, and but a means of organizing the first government, and of establishing the basis upon which they should be clothed with statehood.

But the country now formed into Territories is largely composed of mineral and pastoral lands, which will not attract or support so dense a population as the agricultural lands have done, so that the territorial governments will in many instances be permanent in their character for many years to come. In this condition of affairs it becomes the duty of wise statesmanship to devise a system of government which will render the people contented and happy, which will aid them in developing the resources of the country, and in adding to the wealth, power, and prosperity of a common country.

Mr. Chancellor Kent, in speaking of the form of government in the Territories and of the condition of a country which would be for a considerable period a Territory, says in the first volume of his Commentaries, § 386:

> * * * If, therefore, the Government of the United States should carry into execution the project of colonizing the great valley of the Columbia or Oregon River to the west of the Rocky Mountains, it would afford a subject of grave consideration what would be the future civil and political destiny of that country. It would be a long time before it would be populous enough to be created into one or more independent States; and in the mean time, upon the doctrine taught by the acts of Congress, and even by the judicial decisions of the Supreme Court, the colonists would be in a state of the most complete subordination and as dependent upon the will of Congress as the people of this country would have been upon the King and Parliament of Great Britain if they had sustained their claim to bind us in all cases whatsoever. Such a state of absolute sovereignty on the one hand and of absolute dependence on the other is not congenial with the free and independent spirit of our native institutions, and the establishment of distant territorial governments, ruled according to will and pleasure, would have a very natural tendency, as all pro-consular governments have had, to abuse and oppression.

The dangers and abuses of proconsular government, so clearly foreseen by Mr. Chancellor Kent, have long been familiar to the people resident in the Territories, and a change in the system which should give to those people the right to elect their officers would be hailed with joy and hope by the people, irrespective of party affiliations.

I do not intend to say that all who hold Federal offices in the Territories are unfit for their positions, but that a very large percentage of them are utterly unworthy is an undoubted fact. We sometimes have competent, good men appointed to office, but too often the Territories are looked upon as a political Botany Bay, to which men are sent as governor, secretary, or judges, who are unfit and incompetent for the positions, and who in their own homes could secure no office of honor or profit from the people who knew them, but who were recommended for territorial appointment in order to billet them upon some unfortunate and long-suffering people.

When the Territories are new and feeble they need wise, prudent, and energetic management of their affairs, in order to develop their resources and invite and attract attention to them. Then it is that they need the nurture and care of officers who are identified with them in interest, whose hopes and aspirations are bound up in the progress and prosperity of people and Territory, for when communities become great, powerful, and prosperous they run along even if badly ruled and managed with a certain degree of order and regularity.

Mr. Speaker, the great country west of the Missouri River is but beginning to be known and developed; it is and must ever remain the great mineral-producing section of the country. If we are to have a resumption of specie payments in this country it must come from our production of the precious metals exceeding our export to pay the interest upon our bonded indebtedness in foreign hands, or it must come from the contraction of the volume of currency. In any event the production of gold and silver should be encouraged by every means. I believe that the mineral production of the Rocky Mountain region will increase year by year; scarcely a week passes but some new and valuable mine is discovered. As a mere economic question emigration to those sections of country and development of their resources should be encouraged by every means in the power of the Government. Population and capital are kept out of the Territories by the present system of government. We believe that a change in the system of the government of the Territories would add very largely to their prosperity and that it is therefore a question which appeals not only to what is right and just under our form of government, but also to the self-interest of the Republic.

During the century we have amended the Constitution until all men are entitled to equal privileges by the fundamental law of the land. Slavery of the colored man has been abolished; and to-day, having passed the centennial day of the nation, it has within its borders no serf or slave, no person or community deprived of the inestimable right of liberty and local self-government, except it be the people of the Territories of the United States. How auspicious the time for giving to every citizen of the Union residing in the Territories the great privilege of liberty and local self-government, and making this Government in fact what it is in theory, a Government where the people as of right shall select their officers and rulers.

The people of the Territories are not strong enough or powerful enough to compel an acknowledgment of their right to self-government, but they ask it of the American Congress as a right, trusting to the justice of members to see that the great principle that "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" shall not be made a living lie in this Republic by the arbitrary and unrepublican government imposed upon the people of the Territories.

Mr. Speaker, there was a time when great political contests, now happily impossible, caused the Territories to be the field of the thought and study of the statesman; but now that they are deprived of political importance and power, they are being neglected, and their great resources and possibilities scarcely realized even if thought of. But here is a field worthy the thought and care of the statesman: the better government of large communities of American citizens, an increase of liberty and rights to half a million of people, with increase of happiness, progress, and prosperity.

The Territories are all capable of great development. Nothing, in my judgment, would do so much for their development and to induce labor and capital to emigrate to them as to give the people a government of their own, to open the avenues of political preferment to the citizens of the Territories, giving the people a government of their own choice, responsible directly to them for any dereliction of duty or abuse of power, and bringing the legislative, executive, and judicial branches into harmonious action for the advancement and prosperity of the Territories. Take for example the Territory of Wyoming, rich in all the elements and resources necessary to make a great and powerful commonwealth; with an area of coal-beds estimated to embrace 30,000 square miles, with coal-mines in operation at various points, one mine, near Evanston, in the western portion of the Territory, being in a vein of coal twenty-seven feet in thickness, with deposits of sulphur as rich as any in the world; with its copper and inexhaustible supplies of iron of all kinds; with its mines of gold and silver, and its great undeveloped mineral region of the Big Horn, Powder River, Tongue, Rosebud, &c., believed by all who have any knowledge of it to be by far the richest mineral region on the continent; with its great forests of pine; with its agricultural resources; with its great grazing plains, almost boundless in extent, where cattle fatten all the year round without shelter or feeding in winter; with its great Yellowstone National Park, containing the greatest natural wonders of the world; with the great line of railroad running through the entire length of the Territory from its eastern to its western border; with its healthy and salubrious climate, why should it not be what nature has intended it to be, the Pennsylvania of the trans-Missouri country? And is it not to the interest of the entire country to develop such resources and encourage the emigration necessary therefor? And would it not be the part of wisdom to aid by all proper means the people who are engaged in making its resources pay tribute to American enterprise and industry?

Give Wyoming a government of and by its own citizens, and its development and prosperity will be greater than can be hoped for under the present system, and in one-half the time it would take under the present mode of government it would be ready to take place in the ranks of the great mineral, manufacturing, and grazing States.

I have endeavored to call attention to the misgovernment of the Territories, but can only allude to it in a general way and not so much in detail as would be desirable. There is a demand and hope in all the Territories for a better method for the selection of officials than that now existing.

I hope and trust that the Forty-fourth, the "Centennial" Congress will signalize its history by guaranteeing to the people of the Territories the right of home-rule and local self-government. If it shall do so it will do more to advance the happiness, progress, and prosperity of our people than could be effected by any other legislation in their behalf and will commend itself to the gratitude and good-will of the people it has benefited and enfranchised. And the celebration of the "centennial" will be associated in their minds not alone as a festal year to commemorate the escape from the thralldom of a colonial form of government of the original thirteen States and the laying of the foundations of this the greatest and grandest Republic of the world, but it will also be to them a year glorious in that it has abolished the colonial system under which they live and restored to them all the rights of American citizens, making them indeed feel that this is a Government where all enjoy equal rights, and where, even in the Territories, the people shall hereafter possess the inestimable right to choose the officials who shall rule over them and administer their laws.

SPECIE PAYMENTS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, at an early day in the session I introduced a bill (H. R. No. 910) requiring national banks to prepare for specie resumption by the accumulation of a coin reserve, which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency. The resumption act of 1875 gives the Treasury ample powers to provide itself with coin for the redemption of United States notes presented for that purpose, provided that the banks, in order to supply their own vaults, do not at and after the date fixed for resumption, send to the Treasury to exchange for coin simultaneously their United States notes, and thus exhaust the Government store. To guard against this, a sufficient stock of coin must be accumulated to supply the channels of circulation as well as a reserve for emergencies after resumption. The burden of this accumulation of coin for general circulation falling under existing law upon the Treasury alone should be shared by the banks, which after resumption will need a coin reserve as well as the Treasury.

That bill, and all others relating to resumption of specie payments through the banks, remains with the committee. By permission of the House I will proceed to discuss the present condition of the public credit, the necessity, time, and modes for the resumption of specie payments, and in what manner the provisions of the bill will aid in maintaining a safe and permanent resumption.

Failing to announce any safer, surer, and more feasible mode, or to present aught worthy of commendation in the financial record of its party, the democratic national platform of June last arraigns the republican party for its failure to make good the promise of the legal-tender notes, "the non-payment of which" it asserts to be "a disregard of the plighted faith of the nation." It denounces the party for alleged imbecility and immorality, because that "during eleven years of peace it has made no advance toward resumption and no preparation for resumption." It asserts that "reform is necessary to establish a sound currency, restore the public credit, and maintain the national honor." Professing to desire resumption, it "denounces the resumption clause as a hinderance to resumption and demands its repeal."

Is it true that during the last eleven years the republican party has accomplished nothing toward the restoration of the public credit and the extinguishment of the public debt? Eleven years ago, at the beginning of the year, gold was quoted at 216 and the United States paper dollar was worth 43.6 cents in coin. Three months later the confederate capital was occupied by Union troops, Lee's army had surrendered, and the rebellion was ended. Soon the vast army was marched northward and homeward, and mustered from the service. The public debt and public expenditures had reached their maximum. The accumulation of military and naval stores and munitions of war ceased. The millions of soldiers lately in arms resumed their wonted peaceful avocations. The work of reconstruction and restoration was commenced. The credit of the Government solemnly pledged to the payment of the whole national debt depended upon the confidence or distrust in the good faith of the nation and its ability to perform its obligations.

At that time, eleven years prior to the 28th of June last, how stood the public credit? The 6 per cent. coin bonds of the United States were selling in the markets of the world for sixty-nine cents on the dollar and the United States legal-tender dollar was worth but seventy cents.

On the $830,000,000 of 7-30 notes then being issued, convertible and within three years all converted into 6 per cent. 5-20 bonds, the Government pays interest at the rate of 8¼ per cent. on the coin value actually received, and could then borrow at no lower rate. The public debt of the United States stood upon the books at $2,757,689,540, and with the unadjusted accounts and claims afterward allowed exceeded $3,000,000,000, and the annual interest charge was $145,817,684. Three years thereafter the debt had been diminished to $2,497,517,733 and the annual interest charge to $129,318,151, but the gold premium for the month of June averaged exactly the same figure that it did for the same month three years before. The volume of paper currency had been reduced from $938,476,019 in December, 1865, to $767,971,825 January 1, 1868.

Why, in the midsummer of that year, was the gold premium at 40 per cent., and the legal-tender dollar worth but seventy cents in coin? Two mighty parties were marshaled in bloodless strife for the control of the Government and Treasury for the next four years. Two armies were contending in the field of argument. Two banners were borne aloft; on one was emblazoned "irredeemable paper," on the other inscribed "coin redemption." The public credit vibrated as the prospects of success seemed to incline toward the one or the other party. The premium on gold ran from 137 in May and June to 143 in September and October, and fell after the election to 139 in November and 135 in December.

Thus stood the public credit when the control of the finances passed from the hands of Andrew Johnson, who, although elected as a republican, had rendered his administration so acceptable to the democratic party as to elicit a special resolution of thanks and cause its incorporation in its national platform.

SINKING FUND ESTABLISHED.

Soon after the inauguration of President Grant, Secretary BOUTWELL established the sinking-fund account required by the act of February 2, 1862. The 6 per cent. bonds of the United States were selling at 18 per cent. discount, and though rising in value, averaged for the next two years and a half 8 per cent. discount.

The first purchases made on sinking-fund account in May, 1869, were at 82.7 gold, and the average price to September 30, 1871, was ninety-two cents. The credit of the Government when President Grant was inaugurated, measured by the value of 6 per cent. bonds absolutely payable in fifteen years, was so low that it could borrow money only at a rate of interest equal to 7½ per cent. gold. In two years it had improved to 6½ per cent. Eleven years ago the 5 per cent. coin bonds were worth less than seventy cents on the dollar in coin. A few days since $5,833,000 of 5 per cent. bonds were sold for 103.78$\frac{7}{8}$ gold, making the Government credit to be now so high as to be able to borrow money at less than 4½ per cent. interest on a ten-year bond.

The gain in reduction of interest at the present rate compared with the sale at which the Government borrowed in 1865, at the gold value of those bonds or of the legal-tender notes exchanged for the bonds, is 4 per cent. annually; a saving of $50,000,000 of annual interest on the present value of interest-bearing debt. The Government credit has never been as high as to-day. The official reports conclusively establish the assertion.

John C. Spencer, Secretary of the Treasury, in his annual report for 1843, states "that to meet outstanding Treasury notes, of which more than $8,000,000 soon fell due, a loan of $7,000,000 was advertised, and ten-year 5 per cent. bonds were put upon the market. Bids were accepted and the loan awarded for the whole at a premium of 1.01 per cent., except the amount of two small bids, the best being for $100,000 at 102.375, and for $56,000 at 101.55."

The total debt of the Government at that time was only $32,742,922 to a population of 19,000,000. Then, with a per capita debt of less than one and a half dollars, the Government credit on a 5 per cent. bond was 1 per cent. premium. To-day, with a debt of $50 for each inhabitant, the credit under eleven years of republican control has risen upon a similar bond from 30 per cent. discount to nearly 4 per cent. premium.

Let me recapitulate. During the last eleven years the Government has paid in interest on the public debt $1,335,344,728, reduced the principal from the amount then and subsequently ascertained and adjusted at least $1,000,000,000, reduced the interest rates on its interest-bearing debt from an annual interest charge of $145,877,684 to $95,101,769, making the annual saving $50,715,915. The rate of interest on the sum actually borrowed was then 8¼ per cent.; present rate on loans 4½ per cent.; saving in rate of interest 4 per cent. What country or party has ever presented a brighter record or accomplished so much within so short a period in the improvement of the public credit?

It is true that all has not been accomplished in restoring the Government credit that could be done. The United States notes are at a discount and unstable in value. Under many adverse circumstances, running through the cycle of a commercial crisis, with its period of speculation and collapse, rise and fall of prices, the nation has been slowly advancing to an ultimate resumption of specie payment and the redemption on demand of these obligations. It successfully resisted the pressure made by speculators and visionary theorists for a permanent irredeemable currency. It has proposed at a future date to attempt the redemption of its legal-tender notes in coin for those who prefer the latter to the promises of the Government.

To a further reduction of the annual-interest charge the republican party have at this session found an insurmountable obstacle.

The Secretary of the Treasury desired authority to refund the 6 per cent. bonds in bonds bearing interest at 4½ per cent., having a longer time for payment than those now authorized by existing law. The democratic majority of this House, where such bills must emanate, have refused and neglected to consider the question, and the bill that would have secured the conversion of $300,000,000 of 6 per cent. bonds into 4½ per cent. bonds, and saved annually $4,500,000 in interest, still sleeps in committee. The democratic platform arraigns the resumption act as a hinderance to resumption; but the democratic majority refuse to pass any measure that will better effect or secure the resumption it professes to desire.

But, Mr. Speaker, I desire to discuss this great question on a higher plane than its mere partisan relations.

For several years past, from session to session, the nature, quality, material, and function of money, and the duty of the Government in its regulation, have been discussed in this House. An inexcusable ignorance of the fundamental laws underlying economic questions has perhaps justified a frequent recurrence to elementary principles, and even a review of the facts and reasoning by which their correctness has been demonstrated. Assuming that the nature and function of money are well understood, I desire to discuss the practical questions of what shall our money consist, how shall it be provided, what legislation is needed to secure uniformity of value without disturbance to business interests.

Several leading monetary systems have been presented here and advocated before the country. Among them—

First, an exclusive paper currency issued by the Government made a legal tender in all payments and interconvertible and reconvertible with interest-bearing bonds.

Second, coined money and redeemable United States notes.

Third, coin and redeemable bank-notes.

Fourth, coin, United States notes redeemable in coin, and bank-notes redeemable in either of the former.

The first is advocated, with variations, by the believers in a system of finance that discards coin and holds that the Government stamp gives the value. The three latter are but modified forms of a monetary system that provides both coin and redeemable paper as current money.

The paper-money advocates ignorantly claim that leading statesmen such as Jefferson, Webster, Clay, and Calhoun indorsed their scheme; that it was tried in Venice for five hundred years and there successfully worked without panic or suspension. I have taken pains to read up the speeches of the distinguished legislators to whom they refer as well as Venetian history upon which they rely. They are mistaken in both. Expressions in debate, made by Clay, Calhoun, and Webster, isolated from their subject-matter and context, have been quoted for the purpose of giving the impression that these great statesmen sustained such a proposition. They are most ignorantly or dishonestly cited as authorities. These great men were contemporaneously for forty years identified with the legislation of the country, and their utterances are regarded as the ablest exposition and advocacy of the views they entertained upon the purpose, policy, and constitutionality of public measures adopted or discussed during their participation in legislation. Their opinions on constitutional questions are quoted almost as frequently as the decisions of the highest courts. I protest that to give weight and character to the frantic demand for irredeemable paper the record of eminent leaders and statesmen of the past shall not be falsified nor opinions be ascribed to them that they never entertained.

Were these statesmen believers in an irredeemable currency? Never! Cited as witnesses they prove only that, in the language of

MR. CALHOUN,

A paper issued by Government, with the simple promise to receive in all dues, leaving its creditors to take it, or gold and silver, at their option, would, to the extent to which it would circulate, form a perfect paper circulation, which could not be abused by the Government; that would be as steady and uniform in value as the metals themselves.

He affirms that it is within the constitutional power of Congress to use such a paper in the management of its finances.

The paper circulation he described was "a paper to be issued by the Government with the simple promise to receive in all dues, leaving its creditors to take it, or gold or silver, at their option," but Mr. Calhoun never claimed or admitted that the Government had the right or ought to compel the unwilling citizen to take it in payment of Government, much less private, debts. Who questions the power of the Government to say that its own promises shall be receivable in satisfaction of taxes or debts due the Government? Clay believed it, Webster affirmed it, the law repeatedly sanctioned it to some extent; but the Government debtor was left the option to take the paper or coin, as he chose.

JACKSON A HARD-MONEY MAN.

The life-long friend and defender of President Jackson took his pen twenty years after the close of Jackson's administration to deny that the latter had favored paper money, asserting that General Jackson labored—

To restore and preserve the hard-money currency which the founders of our Government had secured (as they believed) for us. * * * The issue of currency and its regulation was placed in the hands of Congress and limited to the issue of gold and silver and the regulation of its value; for our present Government was formed by hard-money men who had seen and felt the disastrous and demoralizing effect of paper money, and were anxious to save their posterity from such calamities as they had suffered. (Thomas H. Benton's letter to National Intelligencer, November 15, 1857.)

MR. CLAY.

Mr. Clay expressed his opinion of irredeemable paper in 1816 on a clause in the bill to charter the United States Bank, authorizing the bank to suspend specie payments, of which John Randolph, characterizing as monstrous and preposterous, said:

What less than monstrous and preposterous was it to insist that Government had a right to make paper a legal tender.

Mr. Clay (Speaker) agreed that the retention of the clause was unnecessary and said that he would no more make a provision for the suspension of specie payments in a bank than in forming a government he would provide for a revolution. (Annals of Congress, Fourteenth Congress, first session, page 1157.)

Subsequently Mr. Clay gave, as one of the reasons for voting for the charter of the United States Bank, that "it would be highly instrumental in the renewal of specie payments."

MR. WEBSTER'S OPINION.

I am astonished at the effrontery of citing Webster as an advocate of irredeemable or legal-tender paper money, who said:

I am certainly of opinion, then, that gold and silver at rates fixed by Congress constitute the legal standard of value in this country; and that neither Congress nor any State has authority to establish any other standard, or to displace this. (Speech of December 21, 1836, on Treasury circular.)

The Government has no power in fact to make anything else current but gold and silver. (February, 1816.)

Why have the facts of history been distorted, the language of statesmen misquoted, their views and life-long convictions misrepresented, statistics compared to sustain an argument rather than to ascertain the real truth? Because garbled quotations and figures presented in the trashy disquisitions of ignorant writers whose pamphlets and tracts burden the mails are believed and relied upon as sources of information rather than carefully perused state papers, speeches, and documents, based upon authentic facts.

BANK OF VENICE.

The history of the bank so far from sustaining the position that legal-tender paper or credits not payable in or convertible into coin are more valuable or as valuable as coin proves, as in every instance that can be adduced, directly the reverse. Colwell's Ways and Means of Payment has been referred to as authority, but hardly bears out the statement; and the two leading early authorities which Colwell quotes, and upon which subsequent writers rely, contradict the position. The Congressional Library contains the works, and I have them before me. The Parfait Négociant of Jacques Savary, first printed at Paris in 1669, and Daru's History of Venice, published in 1819, show that the assignee of a credit on the books of the Bank of Venice was paid by a transfer of credit on the bank-books or coin, at his option. At the outset a (d'abord,) cash-room, or desk was established for that purpose, and cash paid whenever desired.

During the war of the republic with the Turks, the funds of the bank having been loaned to the state and expended, the cash-room was closed; and then, says the writer, in the second edition of the Parfait Négociant, published in 1679, the credits of the bank ranged from 10 to 15 per cent. below coin; but subsequently, the republic having coined some money, the cash office was again opened, which restored confidence. Upon resuming payment in cash, the credits advanced to par with coin. It again suspended payment, according to Daru, tome 3, page 135, from 1717 to 1739; but during all the other periods of its history paid in coin or by giving credit, at the option of the payee. It is true its credit, or rather the ducat du banco which the bank established as its standard or unit of value, was worth 20 per cent. more than the ducat courant, the actual silver ducat in circulation; but Daru explains this. They established a cash office, the purpose of which was to pay at once all paper which was presented. Coins were received and valued by weight and purity and credited and paid out as ducats at a standard worth 20 per cent. more than current ducats, which were debased.

The prohibition against charging more than 20 per cent. premium for bank credits in ducats du banco was designed to prevent the merchants from discrediting the debased current ducats, but was as ineffectual as the attempt to prevent during the war the depreciation of paper by restrictions upon the sale of gold at a premium, or as a prohibition against charging a premium for gold certificates in exchange for subsidiary silver coins would be at the present time.

The premium on sterling exchange is another striking illustration, which, until lately, at New York stood at from 8 to 10 per cent., because the English banks and bankers reckoned in a unit of account worth 42½ cents more than the value fixed by our law for its representative coin. The current legal value of the English pound in the United States was but $4.44, but the same denomination at the Bank of England meant 486, so that the sterling bill at New York at par was worth $\frac{444}{486}$, or 109¼.

The gold coin of the United States (gold eagles) from 1792 to 1834 contained 247½ grains of pure gold, at which time their weight was reduced to 232 grains. The gold dollar of that coinage contained about 1½ grains more than the gold dollar of later coinage, and would be worth if to-day in existence six cents more than the latter. If accounts were kept in and coins estimated at the old standard, the dollar of account—the dollar du banco—would be worth 6 per cent. more than the dollar courant; and if bank credits were received in this dollar of account and current coins valued by it and received and paid out with the old dollar as the standard, bank credits would be worth 6 per cent. over current coined dollars in actual existence.

This is exactly what they did at Venice. They kept their ducat of account, the unit of value, up to the old standard. Daru shows, in volume 2, page 282, that there was a ducat of gold, a ducat of silver or ducat effectif, and a ducat courant ou de compte, each of which was of different value. The ducat effectif was worth eight Venetian livres, and the ducat courant six livres four sols.

In public transactions they reckoned by the ducat effectif, in trade by the ducat courant.

Daru further says, in volume 3:

There was in Venice many sorts of money. They chose the best for the bank. It was the rule to reckon and pay only in ducats effectifs, of which the standard was purer and the alteration less common than that of other coins. It resulted that the bearer of an order upon individuals had to run the risk of being paid in debased money, while the owner of a check upon the bank was certain to receive the higher values. This system secured for the money (literally silver—argent) of the bank a preference over current money and increased the credit of the establishment.

The Parfait Négociant states that the weight of different coins was fixed by statute, and gives the values of the gold coins, which were then worth considerably more than the legal rate. The silver ducat, which was the standard, in order to prevent its being exported as it had been previously, was debased.

Broggia, an Italian writer, in his treatise, Delle Monete, published in 1743, gives a similar explanation of the premium on bank drafts, or agio di banco, and attributes it to the maintenance of the money standard at an invariable intrinsic value, while current coins were depreciated, to the reputation of the banks for solvency, the avoidance of underweight and confusion common on 'change, the certainty of payment, and the security against loss in carrying coin to and from 'change.

This solves the whole mystery of the wonderful premium of bank-paper credits over coin, which has been the basis of so many currency theories.

Mr. Speaker, we have to-day a banking system in many respects similar to that of Venice, which is quoted as the ideal of successful business management. The republic of Venice guaranteed the solvency of the bank to those who used its credits to discharge debts. The United States does the same to the bill-holders of the bank. While the bank gave the option to the creditor to receive payment by credit or in cash, the credit was worth its face in its coin standard. So are gold bank-notes worth their face in coin. When cash payment was interrupted the credits fell to a discount. Irredeemable paper is here at a discount.

The experiment of attempting to make an irredeemable paper circulate at par with coin has been tried in other countries and proved a failure in every case. Our Government tried it without success during the revolutionary war and afterward in time of peace. The plan of issuing United States notes receivable in payment of all public dues, even in so small an amount as $2,000,000, proved a failure when not redeemable in coin on demand.

John C. Spencer said of interest-bearing notes receivable in payment of dues in 1843:

> Notwithstanding all interest had ceased upon more than two millions of the outstanding Treasury notes in consequence of the notice given of a readiness to redeem the whole amount, yet it was perceived that they were not presented for redemption, but were retained by the people for the purpose of remittance in the transaction of their business. This fact indicated that the whole amount could probably be re-issued as the outstanding notes should be redeemed in others of a low denomination, without any or at a nominal interest; and that they would be received with avidity by the public creditors, if made convertible into coin on demand.
> The effort had been made by a former Secretary to substitute notes with nominal rates of interest and also notes with the low rate of 2 per cent., but it had not succeeded, in consequence of their not being convertible into coin on demand; for as the present value of a post-note is diminished in exact proportion to the time it has to run before maturity, a discount upon it can only be prevented by allowing interest equivalent to that time. The question of convertibility, therefore, was in truth a question whether interest should or should not be saved, as the permitting the notes to be at a discount was not to be tolerated.

Observe that when "notice was given of a readiness to redeem the whole amount" the notes were not presented for redemption, but were retained by the people; but when inconvertible Treasury notes were offered, although bearing interest, the people would not take them except at a discount.

Another Secretary of the Treasury shows in his report (see report Secretary of the Treasury, December 8, 1815) that bank bills, although specie payment was suspended, were preferred to Treasury notes made receivable in payment of all dues to the United States and fundable in 6 per cent. bonds.

Upon the option to subscribe to the 6 per cent. stock in Treasury notes or money in New York City, $658,371 was subscribed to be paid in Treasury notes, and only $601 in money; less than 1 per cent. The loan was placed upon the market at ninety-five cents, so that the Treasury notes of a limited amount made receivable in payment of public dues were esteemed less valuable than bank bills and were regarded as the poorer currency.

METALLIC STANDARD THE BASE OF VALUES.

We must, then, base our monetary system upon the metallic values in use throughout the world to secure stability and prevent depreciation.

An exclusive, irredeemable, paper circulation will constantly fluctuate in value. A commercial nation like ours, having $1,000,000,000 value of annual exchanges with foreign nations, cannot reject the use of specie, the common measure in adjusting international exchanges. These values bought or sold abroad by the coin standard will be bought or sold at home at a price in the paper-credit standard, increased or diminished by the varying difference between the value of the coin and paper. And thus coin, being the base and standard for measuring the values of exports and imports, will really be the base and ultimate standard for measuring the values of the ten thousand million dollars total annual production of the country. Coin is a necessity for commerce. Irredeemable paper is an unreliable standard of value.

To gold and silver, which only the Constitution permits the States to make a legal tender, usage and law have added a currency of national and bank notes. These with coin constitute the circulation, the money of the country.

The United States note is the promise, say the Supreme Court in 7 Wallace's Reports, to pay a coined dollar. While the national-bank notes may be paid in coin or with United States notes, the latter are payable in coin only. The monetary system authorized and contemplated by existing laws proposes to furnish the people a circulating medium consisting of gold and silver coin supplied from the Mint, $300,000,000 of United States notes, redeemable in coin on demand, and national-bank notes limited in amount only by the ability of the banks to furnish required security and make redemption in United States notes or coin.

It is the safest, surest, soundest system that has been devised, and is in use in other countries. Under it for the last twelve years national banks now numbering over two thousand have kept in circulation from $300,000,000 to $350,000,000 of their notes annually, without the loss of a dollar to the bill-holder, and have received and paid out annually thousands of millions of depositors' money with the loss to the latter as estimated of only $3,984,503.

A system so secure in the past has commended itself to the approval of the American people, and they look with disfavor upon experimental and visionary schemes for its change or attempted improvement. They ask for the money of the country stability and interchangeability, so that currency and coin may be equivalent in value and equally effective for facilitating exchanges or discharging indebtedness.

Shall the currency be supplied wholly by the Government, or, as in France, England, and the most of commercial nations, by banks, the Government restricting and regulating the amount according to the security for the circulation?

It is claimed that the Government should issue the circulation without the intervention of banks. The difficulty of adjusting the amount of circulation to be issued and the immense power it would place in the hands of executive officers to expand or contract the circulation and thus change values are admitted. This, it is affirmed, will be compensated by an annual saving in interest to the Government, placed usually at $20,000,000, effected by issuing additional United States notes and with them purchasing and canceling the bonds held as a basis for bank circulation. The conclusive answer to this is that no such saving would result to the people by the withdrawal of the bank circulation and substitution of the United States notes therefor.

NATIONAL-BANK PROFITS.

There are no such great additional profits to bankers from their issue of circulation as is charged.

But if, says one, the Government were to issue directly $318,000,000 of United States notes, and with them redeem bonds held as security for the bank circulation, requiring all the latter to be retired, would not the interest on at least $275,000,000 of bonds, which at present premium could be bought with the $318,000,000, be saved? That interest at 5 per cent. would amount to $13,750,000.

The Treasury would save the interest on the one hand, but the bankers would gain and the Treasury and people lose taxes which last year amounted to—

First, the tax on circulation	$3,283,405 89
Second, the national tax on bank capital	507,417 76
Third, the State and local taxation	10,076,332 00
Total	13,867,253 65

That their circulation is not the source of enormous profit to national banks, commonly supposed, is clearly shown by Comptroller Knox in his last annual report. He compares the income received by the national banks from bonds and circulation with the income that would be received from same capital loaned on bond and mortgage security.

Taking the statement for November 1, 1875, which showed that the United States Treasurer held as security for circulation, other than gold-notes issued to national banks, $361,498,112 of bonds worth in currency at that date $425,840,533, the circulation issued to the banks, being 10 per cent. less than the face of the bonds, would be only $325,348,260, of which 5 per cent. must be deposited with the Treasurer as a redemption fund, leaving the banks but $309,080,847 available for use. The income from the loan of this circulation at 8 per cent., average rate throughout the country, would be $24,726,467. The income from the bonds Mr. Knox shows to be $18,530,554 in gold and $768,870 in currency, worth at the gold premium of that date (16 per cent.) $22,264,312, from which subtracting the 1 per cent. tax on circulation, $3,253,482, leaves $19,010,830 as the net currency income from the bonds.

Says the Comptroller:

> This added to the net interest received on the bonds ($19,010,830) gives $43,737,297 as the whole income derived by the national banks from their circulation and from the bonds deposited to secure it. The capital used to purchase the bonds, ($425,840,533) if loaned at 8 per cent. annual interest, would produce an annual income of $34,067,042, and the difference, which is $9,670,055, or 2¼ per cent. on the capital, represents the profit that the banks receive over and above what could be obtained from the loan of the same amount of capital at the rate of interest named. This is concisely shown, as follows:
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Interest on $309,080,847 of circulation, loaned at 8 per cent | $24,726,467 |
> | Interest on United States bonds ($768,870 currency, $18,530,554 gold) | 19,299,424 |
> | Premium, at 16 per cent., on $18,530,554 gold interest | 2,964,888 |
> | Total | 46,990,779 |
> | Less tax on circulation | 3,253,482 |
> | Total profit on capital employed | 43,737,297 |
> | The total capital, loaned directly at 8 per cent., would earn | 34,067,242 |
> | Difference, which represents profit on circulation | 9,670,055 |
> Two and one-fourth per cent. of the capital employed ($425,840,533) is $9,581,412, which, as shown above, is about the value of circulation to the national banks of the country. In localities where the rate of interest is 7 per cent., the value of circulation is somewhat less than 2¼ per cent.; and where the rate is 10 per cent. the profit is less than 1¾ per cent.

This gain to the bankers of $9,670,055 is, however, fully compensated to the community by the gain to the latter of the State and local taxation upon the national banks, which in 1874 amounted to $9,620,326, and was estimated by the Comptroller for 1875 to amount to $10,076,332, being an excess of over $1,000,000 above the profits on circulation. This taxation is an actual gain through the banking system and laws; for of the $439,438,171 of banking capital in 1875, the $423,840,533 invested in bonds would be wholly exempt from such taxation but for its use as a basis for banking and thus becomes liable to taxation as bank stock.

Should the national banks be forced into liquidation this source of local revenue would be wholly lost. The tax on capital would be lost because the real capital of the banks consists chiefly of United States bonds which are non-taxable as such. But such capital paid in or representing bank stock becomes, as stock, taxable, and this taxation is added to the State and national sources of taxation.

Five persons each owning $20,000 of non-taxable bonds organize and associate themselves together as a national bank. They deliver the bonds to the bank and each receives $20,000 of stock. The $100,000 capital in bonds is taxable as $100,000 of stock and the taxation upon the latter is a clear gain to the community as though actual added wealth.

The action of the banks in regard to circulation corroborates this calculation of profits; for there are, as Mr. Spaulding lately stated in an address to the bankers' convention at Philadelphia, 2,375 private bankers, 907 State banks, having $164,366,669 capital, and 666 savings-banks, making a total of 3,948 banks and bankers, exclusive of national banks. Under the free banking law they could, if they desire, and, if profitable, would, purchase and deposit bonds and take out circulation. Evidently they do not consider the profit worth the trouble; but in addition to this evidence it appears that the national banks themselves are voluntarily relinquishing their circulation, and that $60,000,000 of legal-tender notes have been deposited to retire the same amount of circulation, reducing the amount outstanding from $352,000,000 in January, 1875, to $300,000,000 on the 15th of June, 1876, according to the bank reports of that date.

This paper circulation, secure and convenient as it is, lacks one essential for stability of value, redeemability, and is therefore depreciated and inconstant. That the nation will continue to tolerate the present disordered condition of the currency is incredible.

The evils of a fluctuating measure of values have been too often portrayed to need their recapitulation. Speculation is encouraged, honest industry is disheartened. Business enterprise becomes a gambling venture. The laborer's earnings shrink or expand with the schemes of Wall street. Sharpness and cunning are made the roads to wealth, instead of economy and industry.

Mr. Hopkinson, in debate upon the renewal of the United States Bank, in 1816, said of the effect of depreciated bank paper during the war of 1812:

> Speculation became an epidemic which corrupted and destroyed the morals and industry of the country. It followed the farmer into his field, and he sold it; the mechanic into his shop, and he pledged it. Even the daily laborer cast away his spade and his hoe in scorn and determined no longer to rely on the labor of his hands for his bread. Every man, from the highest to the lowest, was to become rich by the magic of those wonderful banks. (Annals Fourteenth Congress, first session, page 1102.)

We are urged to allow these evils to continue and make no effort to commence a return to a fixed monetary standard. Wait for prosperity to bring us to specie payments, say some.

PREPARATION FOR RESUMPTION SHOULD BE COMMENCED.

The country doubtless would not be able to resume to-day. It may not be able in 1879, will not be without preparation and the accumulation of coin, and the time fixed may have to be postponed. There will be three sessions of Congress before that date, and if found impracticable or no suitable preparation has been made, the time can be prolonged as was done in England. Is it an unfavorable time to commence preparing for resumption? It is true that there has been a shrinkage in estimated values and prices are depressed. The property valued is still here in no less quantity. If the national wealth is on the increase, the accumulations of the savings of the poor and the profits of the rich are not diminishing; if the consumption of the comforts of life is greater than a few years ago and the production of staple articles employing the greater portion of the labor of the country is on the increase, can it be possible that the country is not prosperous? In some industries there has been a diminished demand and consequently lessened production; but among the producers of the great staples there are few idlers. There are employed in great manufacturing establishments of cotton and woolen goods and in mining and in the production of iron and steel, according to the census of 1870, but 541,048 laborers, being but 4¼ per cent. of the whole. Half of the laborers of the country are engaged in agriculture.

While a total suspension of industry in these great and important manufacturing and mining interests would bring disaster not only to those directly engaged, but to many dependent industries in the localities where they are situated, the loss of production and number out of employment would be but a small percentage of the great army of workers.

But in these industries but a small proportion are idle from diminished production. The falling off from 1872 in many manufactures is not lessened, and the heaviest reduction from the excessive production of that year is less than 25 per cent. The consumption of the country of the great staples steadily progresses, and the production of 1875, though weighted and competing with the accumulated surplus overproduction of 1872 and 1873, is greater far than that of 1870 and previous years.

I have no statistics on textile fabrics, except silk manufacture, which has increased, but in some industries where there have been the loudest complaints because of the great fall of prices the production, as will be seen, was very great and increasing. The production of coal and metals in 1874 and 1875, though less than the apparent overproduction of 1872, was far greater than that of 1870.

The annual report of the secretary of the American Iron and Steel Association shows the following comparative production:

	1870.	1875.	Increase.
Pig-iron	1,865,000	2,256,581	401,581
Rolled iron, all forms	1,325,000	1,890,379	565,379
Bessemer steel	34,000	290,863	256,863
Other steel	35,000	61,058	26,058

AUGMENTED VALUE AND PRODUCTION OF FARM PRODUCTS.

The gain in live animals on farms from 1870 to 1875 is reported to be: of horses, 2,589,930; mules, 280,085; milch cows, 2,150,068; oxen and cattle, 1,900,024; sheep, 7,457,349. This increased number of live stock, at the prices estimated by the Commissioner of Agriculture for 1875, was worth $300,000,000, and a gain of 20 per cent. on the value in 1870, which exceeds the ratio of increase in population. The prosperity of the agricultural industry is further evidenced by the increased production of cereals and other farm products and the greater acreage of those crops in 1875 than in 1870, which show how busily farm labor must be employed at the plow and in the harvest field.

The statement I submit is compiled from the reports of the Commissioner of Agriculture and statistics kindly furnished by him.

INCREASED TRANSPORTATION AND TRADE.

The same state of things appears in the transportation and exchange of the products of industry. There were more miles of railroads and more freight carried and more passengers traveling upon them in 1875 than in 1871.

In transportation, Poor's Railroad Manual shows the following increase from 1871 to 1875:

	1871.	1875.	Increase.
Miles operated	44,614	71,759	27,145
Gross earnings	$403,329,208	$503,065,505	$99,736,297
From freight	294,430,322	363,960,234	69,529,912
From passengers	108,898,886	139,105,271	30,206,385
Net earnings	141,746,404	185,506,438	43,760,034
Dividends paid	56,456,681	74,294,208	17,837,527

Our foreign trade as well as domestic production is greater than in 1870 or during any previous year.

The total imports and exports during the fiscal year 1870 were $882,877,862 and in 1876 were $1,073,023,789, being an increase of $190,145,927.

The merchandise trade with foreign nations in 1870 was $812,574,881 and in 1876 $1,000,618,704, a gain of $187,043,823.

The merchandise imports in 1870 were $435,958,408 and in 1876 $460,363,675, being an increase of $24,605,267.

The merchandise exports in 1870 were $376,958,408 and had increased in 1876 to $525,434,886; a gain of $148,476,478.

The imports exceeded the exports of merchandise in 1870. The merchandise balance in our favor in 1876 was $79,000,000; total balance gives about $120,000,000 excess of exports in 1876 to $116,000,000 excess of imports in 1872.

CONSUMPTION OF COMFORTS.

A comparison of the relative consumption of tea, coffee, and sugar at different periods is considered by writers upon social economy to be a fair criterion to judge of the prosperity of the country at any given period. Applying this test we find that while the average per capita consumption during the ten years ending in 1860 was, of tea, 1.02 pounds; coffee, 7.13; sugar, 30.87 pounds; the per capita consumption of the same articles for the fiscal year ending June, 1875, was, of tea, 1.47 pounds; coffee, 7.19, and sugar, 35.76. The consumption for the last ten years has been as follows, showing a greater consumption at the present time than the average consumption ten years ago, or during the supposed flourishing days of abundant paper issues:

Consumption of coffee, tea, and sugar, per capita, for the years 1867 to 1875, both inclusive, estimated on amount withdrawn from warehouse or directly imported during the fiscal year.

Year.	Coffee.	Tea.	Sugar, brown and other.
	Pounds.	Pounds.	Pounds.
1867	4.78	0.94	25.87
1868	5.77	1.02	26.97
1869	6.11	1.04	26.69
1870	6.57	1.05	30.68
1871	7.45	1.19	29.48
1872	5.90	0.84	33.17
1873	9.64	2.55	33.05
1874	6.66	1.27	35.27
1875	7.19	1.47	35.76

The consumption of sugar has increased 40 per cent. in ten years, although the duty and gold price are higher than formerly.

TOTAL DEPOSITS IN BANKS INCREASED.

The total deposits in savings and State and private banks and in national banks at the period preceding the panic of 1873, and in June, 1875, were:

Banks.	June, 1873.	May, 1875.
National banks	$641,121,775	$695,347,678
Savings and private banks	1,229,094,594	1,346,014,813
Total	1,870,216,369	2,041,362,491
Increase		171,146,122

The deposits in national banks during the same period increased $54,000,000, their capital $9,000,000, and surplus and undivided profits $15,000,000.

DEPOSITS IN SAVINGS BANKS INCREASING.

The deposits in the savings banks of the country have increased in amount, notwithstanding the depression in prices. The savings of the poor as well as the rich are not being exhausted or diminished. In May, 1875, they aggregated $828,802,889; six months later they had increased to $884,166,239—a gain of over $50,000,000.

RESUMPTION AFTER SUSPENSIONS OF 1814 AND 1837.

The difference between the value of the coin and paper dollar is not greater now than at former periods of commencing resumption after suspension of specie payments. The greater part of the banks of the country suspended during the war of 1812. The premium at New York on specie from 1814 to 1816 is shown in a paper accompanying the report of William M. Crawford, Secretary of the Treasury, February 24, 1820, to have been as follows: In October, 1814, 10 to 11 per cent.; during 1815 averaged 12 per cent.; during 1816, in January 20 per cent., in April 12 per cent., in July 6 per cent., and in October 2½ to 3 per cent. As soon as the United States Bank commenced business, as it was required to pay depositors and redeem in coin when demanded, specie payment was resumed throughout the country.

In 1837 (May 10) the banks of the United States suspended specie payments and did not resume until May of the following year. The premium on American gold during that period, is reported in the Banker's Magazine for November, 1857, page 395, as follows:

July 1	10 to 12
July 29	8 to 9
August 26	8½ to 9
October 21	5½ to 6
December 9	4½ to 5
February 3	4½ to 4¾
March 24	1½ to 3

HOW SHALL RESUMPTION BE ATTAINED?

In the multiplicity of plans and the diversity of opinions it is hazardous to indicate any method. Rather than propose any definite exclusive plan, I will discuss the facts and principles that should control legislation in seeking resumption.

AMOUNT OF PAPER CIRCULATION.

The Comptroller of the Currency reports, July 1, 1876, outstanding bank circulation at $330,879,146, to retire $26,909,332 of which legal-tender notes to that amount had been deposited with the Treasurer, making the effective bank circulation $304,000,000. The Treasury statement for July 1, 1876, shows $404,719,261.89 then outstanding of United States notes, authorized issue held as currency, including $34,446,595.39 of fractional currency; leaving the total amount of currency outstanding, including national-bank notes, $735,628,407.89. Deducting the amount of legal-tenders deposited for retiring bank-note circulation, leaves but $708,000,000 actual circulation.

This reduction has in nowise diminished the amount of loanable capital or tended in the least to raise the rate of interest on loans, as appears from the market quotations, which show call loans offered at the very lowest rates and time loans to be had at less than the rates authorized by law.

The substitution of silver coins for the $34,000,000 of outstanding fractional currency, as authorized by the law enacted at this session, will reduce the paper currency to $674,000,000. At the rate legal-tenders have been reduced since the passage of the act of 1875, only $42,000,000 will have been retired by January, 1879, and the outstanding volume of legal-tenders will then be about $340,000,000, or but $16,000,000 less than they were ten years ago. Should the bank circulation be neither further retired nor increased, the volume of paper circulation will then be only $640,000,000. Provision only will be necessary for the redemption in coin of so much of the $640,000,000 as may be presented for that purpose. As the bank-notes will be payable in United States notes, all that will be required for resumption will be coin sufficient to pay upon demand such amount of the $340,000,000 United States notes as will be presented for that purpose. How much will be required? How and where shall it be accumulated?

AMOUNT OF SPECIE TO MAINTAIN RESUMPTION.

If the amount to be kept in the Government vaults for redemption purposes were the extent of the coin accumulation, the Treasury could soon put itself in condition for resumption.

The bankers rule that the coin reserve shall equal one-third of the total liabilities, circulation and deposits, is deemed prudent and sufficient. It has been long observed by the officers of the Bank of England, below which it is not considered safe.

Mr. Harley Palmer, governor of the Bank of England, testified in 1832:

The average proportion, as already observed, of coin and bullion which the bank deems it prudent to keep on hand is at the rate of one-third of all her liabilities, including deposits as well as issues.

The Treasury would not need a reserve as great proportioned to its outstanding notes, because they would be scattered and in use throughout the country. Being convertible on demand into coin, they would be as acceptable as the latter and not sent for redemption; and if any large amount should be forwarded for that purpose, the resumption act gives ample power to the Treasury to strengthen itself by the sale of bonds for coin.

PAST EXPERIENCE.

Prior to 1860 the banks of the country found from one-third to one-fourth coin reserve amply sufficient to redeem the bank-note circulation upon demand. Less than $100,000,000, probably $50,000,000 of coin in the Treasury would be amply sufficient to meet every demand for redemption purposes.

But a supply of coin must exist outside of the Treasury for commercial and financial transactions. Prior to 1848 the coin in actual circulation was about half the amount of bank-notes. In 1840 the people used $55,000,000 of coin in active circulation with $107,000,000 outstanding notes; in 1846, $56,000,000 of coin, $106,000,000 of notes.

After the discovery and increased production of gold in California the proportion of coin in active circulation increased. In 1850 the bank-note circulation stood at $131,000,000, the coin in active use at $81,000,000; in 1860, notes $207,000,000; coin in use, $197,000,000.

The Government reserve must be strengthened by the further accumulation of $150,000,000 of coin for private use, business transactions, and bank reserves, which will in part consist of coin. The Government under the late legislation will furnish $50,000,000 of this in subsidiary silver coin. What is necessary to be done to obtain or bring into active circulation the remaining $100,000,000 or more that the people will need and use upon the return to specie payment?

HOW SHALL SUFFICIENT COIN BE SECURED OR ACCUMULATED?

Here there is a wide difference between the opinions held as to the cause of currency depreciation and the remedy for its removal. Is it the excess or character of the paper currency that sinks it below coin in value, or is it because it lacks immediate convertibility into coin upon demand?

These questions underlie the whole subject of coin resumption and the proper plan for its attainment. The answers to them point to essentially divergent causes and remedies, each of which has its advocates and disciples. They are:

First. Reduction of the volume of paper circulation.

Second. Accumulate coin, and be prepared upon demand to give coin for paper when desired.

IS THE DEPRECIATION OF THE PAPER CURRENCY CAUSED BY ITS REDUNDANCY OR IRREDEEMABILITY?

Shall Congress seek to return to specie payments by contracting the volume of paper currency or by improving its credit and paying it as agreed?

I assert the currency of the country is not redundant. There are no signs, exclusive of its depreciation, of a plethora of currency; no speculation, no inflation of prices, no hoards of idle circulation. There is little idle circulation anywhere. The Treasury holds but little, if any, above the amount of its national debt, for which immediate call can be made upon the Treasury.

The national banks holding on the 15th of June last in actual cash, including funds with the Treasurer, $168,984,684, which exceeds the reserve required by law, have no more than safe business requires to meet $1,100,000,000 immediate liabilities being less than 16 per cent.

In 1866 and 1867 there were evident signs of a plethora of circulation. The people did not require as much as was then outstanding, and the surplus flowed into and remained in the banks as great reservoirs for retaining a needless excess of paper. But this excess has been reduced by the retirement within two years of that period of $200,000,000 of legal-tender paper by the growth of population, wealth, business, taxation, and production.

The reserve and idle cash in the banks and Treasury since 1865 have been diminishing.

Under a specie-redemption bank system requiring a sufficient legal reserve it is admitted there cannot be redundancy of actual circulation. If more bank-notes are issued than can be used in making business exchanges, they will be returned to the banks for deposit or redemption.

A striking illustration of this appears in the first experience of the United States Bank after it commenced business in 1817. Its capital was $35,000,000, and it could issue notes, bonds, and obligations to that amount. It was required to pay all its obligations, notes, deposits, &c., in specie.

Statement of notes issued and in actual circulation of the United States Bank and branches soon after commencing business.

Period.	Notes issued.	In circulation.	In bank and branches.

Two-thirds of the bills were returned to the banks because not needed by the community, and were held in the vaults. The same law holds good to a large extent in case of irredeemable paper. It is illustrated in the accumulations of paper currency in bank and Treasury vaults in 1865. The paper issues, according to a statement furnished me by the Treasury, and published in full with my remarks on the 26th of May last, were $938,496,019.62, of which the banks and Treasury held $278,795,863.57. Ten years later, when the volume of paper circulation had been reduced $170,000,000, of the reduction one hundred millions came from the banks and Treasury and not from the circulation.

If excess of paper circulation causes its depreciation at the present time, then the value should vary with the quantity outstanding. The premium on gold should be less at the close of 1868, when the total paper issues were only seven hundred and fifty millions, than six years later at the close of 1874 when the volume had been increased $31,000,000, being $781,000,000; yet at the former period gold was quoted at 135.2, at the latter 111.7. At the close of 1869 the volume of currency was $744,000,000, the premium on gold 21.5 per cent. A year later the volume increased to $747,000,000, but the premium was down to 10.7; and four years later the currency, at the close of the year 1873, had increased $32,000,000, being then $776,000,000, while the gold premium had fallen to 10.

I submit a statement prepared from the official statements from the Treasury Department showing the amount of paper currency outstanding and in actual circulation and premium on gold at the close of each calendar year. An examination conclusively proves that the value of the currency, compared with gold, has not varied with the quantity outstanding.

The value of the currency has risen with the general rise of Government credit and value of its interest-bearing obligations and apparent increased or diminished disposition and ability of the nation to redeem its paper in coin.

TREASURY OF THE UNITED STATES, Washington, July 24, 1876.

On the 31st of December, 1874, according to the Treasury statement, the paper currency outstanding amounted to $780,841,600.83, of which $598,010,392 was in circulation outside of the Treasury and banks, and gold stood at 112, with $22,436,761.04 in the New York national banks. Eighteen months later, on the 1st of this month, the outstanding paper currency had been reduced $45,000,000, and yet gold is quoted at 112.

The specie in the New York national banks which during the spring and summer of 1869 had been under $20,000,000 commenced to increase in September of that year and by the 22d of January, 1870, amounted to $48,000,000 and averaged $32,000,000 for the entire year 1870.

Gold commanded a premium of 38 per cent. in June, 1869. In March, 1870, the premium had fallen to 12¼ per cent., and at the close of the year 1870 it stood at 11 per cent. Had advantage then been taken of the accumulation by requiring the national banks to retain as part of their legal reserve the gold interest paid upon their bonds the remaining 11 per cent. premium on gold would have gradually melted away and we should long since have resumed specie payments.

It was my opinion then that a gradually accumulating coin bank reserve was the safest, surest, and easiest road to specie resumption.

Accordingly in 1870 I moved an amendment to the act authorizing the issue of $54,000,000 additional bank circulation, providing—

That hereafter every national banking association shall retain and keep in coin, or Treasury coin certificates, as part of its issue, the interest falling due upon its bonds deposited as security for its circulation until the reserve required to be kept by such bank at its place of business shall consist wholly in coin and certificates.

I am pleased to be able to fortify my opinion by citing the concurrent judgment of able and experienced writers and financiers.

The Banker's Magazine is regarded as a financial authority, and its leading editorials are entitled to consideration as the careful opinions of a cautious, able, and experienced observer of financial principles and phenomena. As early as August, 1871, in view of the diminishing volume of specie in the banks and the rising premium on gold, the editor said:

We are perhaps no nearer to a resumption of specie payments than we were four years ago. A sound policy dictates that while in a state of suspension the banks should gradually enlarge their specie reserve; but the facts indicate that this will only be done by compulsion of law. The banks should retain at least one-half the specie they receive from the Treasury and thus enable themselves in the course of two, three, or four years to contribute to a general resumption. * * * During this period (from January, 1866, to October, 1870) the banks have realized perhaps $100,000,000 in gold as dividends, which as a reserve would now be highly important in the combined movement toward resumption. * * * The national banks of the United States (eighteen hundred in number) have, within the past eighteen months, reduced their specie from $48,000,000 to $19,000,000 in June, 1871, a policy utterly at variance with the true interests of the country.

This is the most important step in the preparation for resumption. It should be taken immediately. At present it seems a necessity. Resumption without specie in the country is impossible. It is meaningless. It is the play of Hamlet with Hamlet left out. We are in the same situation that we were in in 1871. The balance of trade is in our favor, the stock of gold has accumulated, but it will not remain here unless the banks are compelled by law to hold it.

It is astonishing to find how little coin is required for the financial and mercantile transactions of the great cities and money centers. To make the coin payments for customs duties during the last fiscal year amounting to $147,000,000 required less than half a million for average daily transactions. The highest monthly payment was less than sixteen millions. The coin made a short circuit. It went from the banks to the merchants and from them to the custom-house and subtreasury. The Government immediately paid it to public creditors or sold it in Wall street, from which it again went to the banks. This circuit was made many times during the year by the same coin or oftener by its representative, the coin certificate or draft. The Government collected a monthly average of $12,500,000, drawn from the banks and paid monthly on interest and sinking fund account $10,500,000, which again returned to the banks as well as the remaining $2,000,000 sold for legal-tenders.

The store of coin daily held by the banks will disclose how small an amount is actually required. The greatest amount of actual coin in the New York City national banks reported at any one time during the last seven years was, January 22, 1870, $6,196,036.29. The lowest October 1, 1875, $753,904.90. The average amount of the coin checks payable in coin and coin certificates held by the same banks during the same period was about $16,600,000, and the average amount of coin in all the national banks of the country since January 1, 1870, has been less than $20,000,000.

This country is annually producing upward of $70,000,000 of coin and bullion, scarcely a dollar of which remains in the country. It finds no demand for it here. No use to keep it at home, and like other surplus products it seeks a market abroad.

Outside of Texas and the mining States and Territories there is no use for coin, except by the Government to pay interest on its debt and the merchants to pay duties and foreign balances. We shame and put to flight the precious metals, the products of our own mines. We have no reservoirs for the overflow of the millions sweeping through our commercial cities to the European marts of trade. Our Government finds a surplus in its vaults above its own needs, and sells $30,000,000 annually to the merchants. The latter find the existing surplus ample for the payment of their customs dues, they can use no more, so the $70,000,000 annually raised from the mines must go abroad; a drug in our own market, no home use to which it can be applied, it sinks in value and, instead of corn and wheat, tobacco, cotton, provisions, and manufactures, that otherwise would be sent, the coin is shipped and goods are more largely imported.

Make a use for more gold at home, and less will be exported. Require the banks to put annually in the reserve $18,530,554 coin, interest received of the Government, and much more must stay in the country than now remains. If the Government at the same time accumulates a like reserve, by ceasing to sell its surplus coin, in four years $175,000,000 will have been added to the store of specie now in the country, and specie payment can be both resumed and maintained. The enforced accumulation of coin by banks and the Government will necessarily detain it in the country. It will appreciate its price and value in commodities, and will increase their export and diminish their importation. It will tend to turn the balance of merchandise trade in our favor and will appreciate the value and price of the greenback dollar, as it demonstrates the power and determination of the Government and the people to redeem their paper promises.

It is proposed that the banks shall hold the coin as a part of the reserve, loosening from the reserve, where it is now practically tied up, an equal amount of legal-tender notes, of which the reserve now consists. Instead of a measure of contraction, it would so far be a measure of expansion, releasing from the reserve, for actual and active circulation, about $20,000,000 legal-tenders held as reserve. There is no hoarding of earnings or of funds, nor passing of dividends, to accumulate a coin reserve, any more than there would be to keep a legal-tender reserve. The bank would lose the premium on the gold which otherwise it could sell. This would diminish its net profits to that extent, amounting at present rates to a little over ½ per cent. upon its capital stock. But a bank is but an aggregation of capitalists, whose loans are repaid in a more valuable currency as the country progresses toward specie payments. The capital of the bank, though nominally the same number of dollars, would acquire a higher purchasing power.

As, however, this pressure will disappear when resumption is reached, the profit from the sale of the coin now realized will be but temporary, and would be less than the gain to the banks by the increased value given to their assets by resumption.

The most important legislation, therefore, needed to secure permanent, safe, and gradual resumption of specie payments is to require the banks to prepare therefor by the accumulation of a coin reserve and the Government to strengthen its own surplus.

When the banks accumulated in 1870 a large amount of coin the gold premium declined over 20 per cent., and there remained without disaster. It was believed that the further step to specie payment, half the distance already passed, could be taken within another year. The gold balance was, however, permitted to decline and the banks to average but twenty-two millions in their vaults for 1871, twenty and a half millions for 1872, and less than fifteen millions in 1875. The designation and approach of a fixed date had no effect to diminish the gold premium, which in March, 1870, with a store of $37,000,000 of gold in the national banks of New York, stood at 12¼ per cent., and in October, 1875, with $8,000,000 only in the same banks, ranged from 16⅛ to 17 per cent.

Resumption of specie payments after the war of 1812 was secured in this manner and mainly effected through the national United States Bank. It brought up the credit of the Government. The Government had issued what were called small Treasury notes to the amount of $4,142,850, which were receivable in payment of all duties and taxes laid by the United States and all public lands sold by their authority, all payments to the United States, and fundable in 7 per cent. stock, and there were outstanding of these and other Treasury notes thus receivable on the 1st of October, 1815, $16,205,101. Their market-price in 1815 varied from seventy-five to ninety cents on the dollar. Payments in bank paper were universally preferred during that period to payments in the paper of the Government. (See Treasury report, December 8, 1815.)

COMMERCIAL PANICS.

The opponents of a specie reserve for bank or Government currency cite the commercial panics that have occurred in this and other countries as disastrous evils resulting from basing paper money upon a promise to redeem it in coin. They overlook or conceal the well-attested fact that bank suspensions and commercial crises first manifest themselves in failure to pay out money of any kind, paper or coin. Merchants and their indorsers fail to pay their notes. Banks fail to pay depositors, not bill-holders.

The panic of 1873 was no different from prior panics; 1857 and 1873 were alike in cause, circumstance, course, and consummation. Jay Cooke & Co. in the one, the Ohio Life and Trust Company in the other, have made improvident and unavailable loans. Depositors' calls for funds cannot be met; accommodation from other banks cannot be obtained, for the securities are already hypothecated or inadequate; the bankers shut their doors in the face of depositors; the community is alarmed; depositors in other banks rush to the counters; checks, not bank-bills, are presented to the busy tellers for payment, and banks with least circulation and largest deposits are the first to succumb.

The weakest place in our banking system is the vast volume of deposit credits. They averaged for six months prior to May 31, 1875, in banks of all kinds other than national $1,331,989,366.39; in national banks, $695,347,677.70; total, $2,017,453,300.87. Every dollar of this was due on demand.

The outstanding circulation was less than one-sixth of this sum being only $324,136,459.

The law permits the $300,000,000 of United States notes required to be redeemed, if demanded, to be again re-issued as a bank note can be re-issued in place of a similar note redeemed. There is no danger, then, of an alarming contraction or that there will be insufficient currency.

The country has been kept in alarm by the opponents of specie resumption, who mistakenly charge that the panic of 1873 was the result of a contraction of the currency and assert that resumption will bring the same disaster. I have repeatedly shown the falsity. I procured the official figures, already submitted, to show the total amount of paper currency. The years 1870, 1871, and 1872 were regarded as the most prosperous of any after the close of the war, whether measured by the progress of production or the prices obtained. Yet in all those years, and for two years prior thereto, the amount of paper circulation was less than in December, 1873, or for any time since.

In December, 1868, the paper circulation was $750,000,000, fell to $744,000,000 in 1869, and by December, 1872, had risen to $752,000,000. In December, 1873, it was $24,000,000 higher, and in 1874, $29,000,000, and last December stood at $760,000,000.

But it may be said I have not included in this comparison the 7.30 notes. Those who charge the panic to contraction add to the legal paper circulation of 1865, which amounted to $938,476,019.62, the $830,000,000 7.30 interest-bearing notes, making the paper circulation, as they say, $1,768,000,000, from which subtracting the $752,000,000 outstanding January 1, 1873, they say that there was between 1865 and 1873 a contraction of $1,016,000,000. The answer to this is the whole reduction was made before December, 1868. The seven-thirties, being interest-bearing obligations, did not go into circulation, and being convertible into 5.20 bonds in three years, were at maturity retired and canceled.

There were, as shown by the Treasury books, outstanding—

July 1, 1868	$37,716,650
December 31, 1868	2,174,900

The answer is complete; the argument is irrefutable. The contraction of the paper circulation substantiallly ceased in 1868, and for five years thereafter remained at nearly the same figure during a period of seeming prosperity.

The amount of United States 7.30 Treasury notes (acts of June 30, 1864, and March 3, 1865) outstanding on the dates given below, is as follows:

December 31, 1864	$103,456,000
July 1, 1865	686,662,050
December 31, 1865	830,000,000
July 1, 1866	806,251,550
December 31, 1866	676,856,600
July 1, 1867	488,647,400
December 31, 1867	240,291,400
July 1, 1868	37,717,650
December 31, 1868	2,174,900
July 1, 1869	1,166,500

The panic and present depression in business arose from causes disconnected from the currency. The high prices, the unprofitable investments, the overproduction and diminished consumption of clothing, tools, implements, and manufactures in 1872 and previous years may have been aided but were not occasioned by previous currency inflation. The collapse of values was but the sudden and violent return to the normal standard of prices. It left speculators possessed of lands and goods and stocks on a falling market.

The facts and considerations I have presented prove that—

First. The saving to be effected by the substitution of United States notes for bank notes is a trifling amount, if not wholly imaginary.

Second. That no irredeemable paper currency has circulated in any country on a par with coin.

Third. That the depreciation of our paper currency is caused by its irredeemability and not by its redundancy.

Fourth. That coin should be accumulated for resumption by the banks as well as by the Government.

Fifth. That it is not unjust to the banks to require them to share with the Government the burden of accumulating the necessary coin reserve.

COINAGE OF GOLD AND SILVER.

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Speaker, a strong, athletic man in a stupor is a melancholy spectacle. Within him are all the elements of a healthful life and vigorous activity. He is great in person, strong in limb, and full of the crimson blood which should send the ruddy glow of health to the cheek. But instead of being thus, his eyes are glassy, his limbs are paralyzed, his body is supine, and the blood flows in sluggish streams to his extremities. He impresses us with the idea of death; death striking down a giant in the prime of his vigor and manhood. Our country presents as sad a spectacle. It is great in extent, wonderful in resources, and teeming with an energetic and intelligent population. Its line of seacoast is everywhere indented with magnificent harbors, its area is penetrated in every direction with navigable rivers, its surface is covered with a net-work of railroads, the telegraph and canal are extended wherever commerce and convenience require them. With such a country prosperity and happiness should pervade its every hamlet and extend to its uttermost limits. Where but a few years ago all was bounding activity there is now a change. The sails of commerce are flapping idly in our harbors, vessels plying upon our rivers move without their accustomed cargoes, and trade and business fly crashing through the courts of bankruptcy. The spindles upon our streams are still, the fires in the furnaces are extinguished, the mines lie idle for want of profitable working, while a million of men who a few years ago were smiling in the sunshine of well-paid labor are now paupers with starving families or are outlawed tramps receiving the kicks and scoffs of their more fortunate fellows.

That this is no overdrawn picture every day's experience teaches us. The number of business failures to-day is greater than those of yesterday; to-day's sales of the products of the loom show a greater loss upon the cost of manufacture than those of the day before; each morning's paper heralds, "Another mill shut down and another thousand laborers thrown out of employment;" and we read of bread-riots and of the misery and starvation which impel honest men to become violators of the law.

Many causes are assigned for this deplorable condition in our affairs. Some assert it to be a necessary result, brought about by an inevitable re-action consequent upon the overproduction, overtrading, extravagant investment, and wild speculation begotten by the use of a superabundant and depreciated currency. Others declare it to be chargeable to the corruptions of public officials and their wasteful and extravagant expenditures of the public moneys; to vicious financial legislation, which has largely added to the public debt, lessened the capacity of the nation to meet its liabilities, and made capital timid and rendered it more safe and profitable to hoard money or to invest it in bonded securities than to strengthen industries and commerce by its use; to "reconstruction," which has reduced the South to extremest poverty, and in doing this has destroyed the market which had always been furnished by that section for the products of the capital and labor of the North. That all of these, each in a measure, have tended to produce these results, candid men of all parties will admit; but to my mind the destructive forces set in operation by the bad financial legislation of Congress since the close of the war have been more potential for the evil than all other causes combined.

During the present session the people have been rudely awakened to the fact that one of the precious metals, that of which our country is the largest producer in the world, has been stripped of its functions as money when coined, and reduced to a mere article of commerce, to be bought and sold in the market as so much wheat or pork. For centuries the civilized and semi-civilized nations of the earth have fashioned silver into money. In the land of sacred history we learn that the human weakness and human greed of Judas led him to receive the thirty pieces of silver as his price for the betrayal of his Master.

Nearly a century ago, after the bloody travail of seven years of war had ended and the statesmen of that period had assembled to construct a chart by which the new nation might be safely guided, they provided as money what the experience of the centuries had taught them would only serve the purpose. Coins of silver equally with those of gold were made the constitutional currency of the new Republic. From that period until 1873 silver as money has walked hand in hand with gold in all commercial transactions and upon the statute-books of the country. Through all our financial vicissitudes, through the wars with England and with Mexico, through the dark days of the rebellion, and when the bright days of victory came—in all those changeful and momentous times—silver money was by law the equal of gold; the one kind possessed no commercial power or function which was not equally the property of the other.

In the United States we have always had the double standard of gold and silver since 1792 and until 1873. When our money was established in 1792 Alexander Hamilton was Secretary of the Treasury, and he selected the Spanish silver dollar as the unit of that money. The relative value of the two metals, gold and silver, had substantially been settled for centuries, and the same relation, that of 1 to 15½, with but slight variation, has continued to exist between them until within a very short period of time. In 1792 the weight of pure silver in a dollar was fixed at 371 4/10 grains, and this weight of silver, so far as the dollar is concerned and except as to the quantity of alloy, has ever remained the same. The silver dollar was at this time also made a legal tender for all debts of whatsoever kind or character and whatever the amount. It was so made for transactions between citizens, between our own people and those of foreign countries, between the citizen and the Government, and between our Government and the other nations of the world. At that time every civilized nation upon the globe used the double standard of gold and silver, and it was impossible that any superior or additional power at the relative values established between the metals could have been legislated into one that was not given to the other.

In 1873 silver was suddenly demonetized. The measure was adopted by the House, apparently without knowledge of the fact, and certainly without investigation or debate. It is within legitimate deduction from established facts to assert that a committee of the House through its chairman, by means of a well-laid scheme, deceived the members of the House and perpetrated a stupendous swindle upon the people of the country. Sir, let us be ever so charitable in our judgment of the conduct of others, and yet the same conclusion would be reached. The scheme to effect this purpose was concealed in a bill to regulate the mints of the United States, reported from the Committee on Coinage, Weights, and Measures, through its chairman, Mr. Hooper. The record shows that this measure being before the House on motion of Mr. Hooper to suspend the rules and pass a substitute reported by him, the following took place:

Mr. HOLMAN. I suppose it is intended to have the bill read before it is put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER. The substitute will be read.

Mr. HOOPER. I hope not. It is a long bill, and those who are interested in it are perfectly familiar with its provisions.

Mr. KEER. The rules cannot be suspended so as to dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. They can be.

Mr. KEER. I want the House to understand that it is attempted to put through this bill without being read.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] move that the reading of the bill be dispensed with?

Mr. HOOPER. I will so frame my motion to suspend the rules that it will dispense with the reading of the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts moves that the rules be suspended and that the bill pass, the reading thereof being dispensed with.

Mr. RANDALL. Cannot we have a division on that motion?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules cannot be divided.

The motion of Mr. Hooper failed.

Mr. Hooper then moved that the rules be suspended and that the substitute for the bill be passed, and that the substitute be read.

The Clerk began to read the substitute.

Mr. BROOKS. Is that the original bill?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. Hooper] applies to the substitute, and that on which the House is called to act is being read.

Mr. BROOKS. As there is to be no debate, the only chance we have to know what we are doing is to have both the bill and the substitute read.

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Massachusetts being to suspend the rules and pass the substitute, it gives no choice between the two bills. The House must either pass the substitute or none.

Mr. BROOKS. How can we choose between the original bill and the substitute unless we hear them both read?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can vote "ay" or "no" on the question whether this substitute shall be passed.

Mr. BROOKS. I am very much in the habit of voting "no" when I do not know what is going on.

Mr. HOLMAN. Before the question is taken on suspending the rules and passing the bill, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will explain the leading changes made by this bill in the existing law, especially in reference to the coinage. It would seem that all the small coinage of the country is intended to be recoined.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This bill makes no change in the existing law in that regard. It does not require the recoinage of the small coins. On the contrary, I understand that the Secretary of the Treasury proposes to issue an order to stop the coinage of all the minor coins, as there is now a great abundance of them in the country. The salaries are not increased; they remain as they were.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is not the salary of the subtreasurer at New York increased?

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. No, sir; it is not increased.

Thus the House, lulled into security by the assurance of Mr. Hooper that the bill "made no change in the existing law, especially in reference to coinage," and after further questions, unimportant in themselves, were asked and answered, passed the measure under a suspension of the rules. It was impossible that debate should have taken place; even the explanations made were out of order, for the motion to suspend the rules acted as a gag upon all discussion. A more revolutionary measure, one more sinister in its design and more oppressive in its results, has not marked the history of legislation even in the revolutionary period of the past sixteen years.

Those most directly interested and benefited by the perpetration of this outrage are the holders of the bonded indebtedness of the United States. The men and the corporations whether in this country or elsewhere hoarding gold for speculation, and Great Britain, which through its colonies is the largest gold-producing nation on the earth, were also immensely interested and have received immeasurable benefits therefrom. The interests of these persons and countries were singularly interlaced. The one receives payment of his debt in money possessing a value which otherwise it would not have possessed, the others have received a price for the substance with which to coin the money they would not otherwise have received.

We will seek in vain for a substantial reason with which to support this iniquitous measure. Certainly it does not lie in the fact that the creditors of the nation had either a legal or an equitable right to demand that the bonds they held should be paid in the coin of one metal to the exclusion of the other. Although there are many men now upon the floor of this House who uphold the measure, or rather who denounce any attempt to restore the old order of things as "repudiation" and "dishonesty," no one has yet been so bold as to deny that the bonds as a contract call only for "coin;" and that when the contract was made the coin, as contemplated, was to be either of gold or silver at the option of the Government. Whether we refer to the acts of July 17 and August 5, 1861, or to those of February 25 and July 11, 1862, or to those of March, 1863, and June 30, 1864, or to any other of the acts or resolutions of Congress passed during the period when our obligations were incurred, it will be found that the only promise made by the Government or exacted by the creditor was that payment should be made in "dollars" or "coin" or "lawful money."

After the war, the people, beginning to feel the crushing burden of the debt, commenced to clamor through the press and at the hustings for the liquidation of that portion of the debt represented by the 5-20 bonds in the money with which they were paid for their labor, the legal-tender currency of the nation. The alarmed bondholders, having obtained the control of Congress in 1869, secured from that body what was termed a pledge of the good faith of the nation to its creditors. In that "pledge" they incorporated their own terms, dictated the language used to frame it, and in so doing they put in the most favorable light their own understanding of the obligations of the Government to them. That pledge, as found in sections 3693 and 3694, is as follows:

The faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin of all the obligations of the United States * * * and of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States. * * * The faith of the United States is also solemnly pledged to make provisions at the earliest practicable period for the redemption of the United States notes in coin. * * * The coin paid for duties on imported goods shall be set apart as a special fund, and shall be applied as follows:

First. To the payment in coin of the interest on the bonds and notes of the United States.

And then follows a few other provisions of an unimportant character.

While the standard silver dollar was worth as much—that is, would purchase as much—as the gold dollar, the bondholding creditors and the speculators in gold were satisfied with their contract. This was so at all times during the war, when the contract was entered into. It was so in 1869, when, fearing the money of the people, they exacted the "pledge" from Congress to make payment in coin. During these periods the cry was for "coin, coin," for nothing but "coin."

> And in his lap a mass of "coin" he told
> And turned upside down, to feed his eye
> And covetous desire with his huge treasury.

But suddenly this cry is changed, and the demand is made, and the pliant tools in Congress are found to so arrange the law as that silver is no longer money, and gold alone can be used to pay their bonds. It will be instructive in this connection to know the value of silver by the gold standard in the London market while these bonds were being sold and while their holders were being fortified by the "pledge" of Congress. We learn from reliable data that—

	Pence per ounce.
Between 1848 and 1856 the yearly average price was between	59¼ and 61½
Between 1862 and 1866 the yearly average price was between	62 and 61
Between 1867 and 1872 the yearly average price was between	61 and 60
In 1873 the yearly average was	59½
In 1874 the yearly average was	58 3-16
In 1875 the yearly average was	56¼

Thus we see that between 1862 and 1866, when the great bulk of the bonds were issued, silver was at its highest price. "Coin" was good enough then. Between 1867 and 1872 the average price had fallen but one pence per ounce; not enough to cause any alarm. Moreover, the bondholder was only anxious during this period to have the "pledge" enacted which rescued him from the legal-tender notes of the people. "Coin" was good enough then. In 1873, the price of silver having still declined, and the creditor class commencing to fear that they had avoided the Scylla of paper money to be ingulfed in the Charybdis of "coin," procured the passage of the demonetizing act, and in doing so exhibited in an intensified form the utter bad faith and relentless greed of this class of Government creditors.

> The lust of gold succeeds the lust of conquest;
> The lust of gold unfeeling and remorseless!
> The last corruption of degenerate man.

If gold had depreciated as has silver, these Shylocks would now be crying aloud for payment only in silver, and declaring it to be "so nominated in the bond." They would not have been without supporters. The same party that has ever legislated in their interests; that has given away to corporations an empire of the public lands containing more square miles than do the six New England States, together with the States of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland, Ohio, and Indiana; the party that is swiftly and certainly raising up in our country an aristocracy based upon money, to grind into the earth the men who labor; the party that is gradually blotting out all vestiges of the Federal Union and replacing it through fraud and the bayonet with a consolidated despotism, would be found seconding their demands and denouncing all opposition to them as repudiation and a violation of the nation's plighted faith.

Why should the power and the value of silver have been thus stricken down by an American Congress? Every reason was against it. The act has abridged the present and the future quantity of our circulating medium and put upon the country, with or without resumption, the burden of a scanty metallic circulation. It has postponed the resumption of specie payment indefinitely by eliminating from the amount of money which might be coined for that purpose annually $50,000,000. It has added at least $200,000,000 to the mountain of debt which is now crushing out the vitality of the people. It has reduced the value of the silver product of the country fully 20 per cent., and thus swept away over $10,000,000 annually from the wealth of the country. It was one of the most potential causes in inaugurating the present business stagnation, and assures its continuance with many increasing evils. It has produced a suspension of mining operations in many of our most productive silver districts, because the reduction of 20 per cent. in the value of silver represents the net profits made by the working of the great majority of the mines. It was done, too, at a time when we had commenced to produce silver more largely in the United States than in all other countries combined. With gold it was otherwise. Of the $118,000,000 annual product of that metal but $26,000,000 were produced in the United States. The first is properly an American product, the latter is European.

It was to the interest of foreign nations to foster gold; it was the duty of the United States to protect its silver. England and Germany, both the great creditor nations of the world, the former producing more gold than all the world besides, demonetized silver that the gold in their vaults might bring the better price and the debtor nations be compelled to pay them greater tribute. It is computed that when the act of 1873 was passed, England, France, and Germany combined did not possess over $200,000,000 in gold; since then they have hoarded, until to-day they have in their banks not less than $700,000,000, or one-fourth of the entire stock of gold coin available for use in the commercial world. Is it any wonder that gold is every day becoming more costly and difficult to obtain? In 1873 we were as now, enormously involved in national, State, and municipal indebtedness. Five billion five hundred million dollars is not too high an estimate of this mountain of debt. Its amount represents within a fraction the entire amount of gold and silver coin in the world.

What a commentary are these facts upon the mad folly of our legislators! At one blow half the money of the world is taken from circulation and made merchandise, and the Government must sell its silver in the very worst market ever offered for that metal that it may purchase gold in the very dearest market with which to pay its debts. At the command of the moneyed powers of the world America has been unamericanized and our commerce, productions, and labor have been placed under tribute to foreign nations

With the silver standard alone in Russia, Austria, China, and the Indies; with the double standard of gold and silver in France, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, the Netherlands, Portugal, and Spain, there was neither necessity nor excuse for following in the wake of England and Germany in their repudiation of silver and the enthronement of gold alone as king.

The duty of Congress in its dealings with this question is plain. Self-preservation, good faith with the people, and good business principles alike demand that this false financial step should be retraced. Silver should be restored to its standard as money. The silver dollar, which from 1792 to 1873 was of the constitutional currency of the nation, should be sufficiently good to meet all of our indebtedness contracted before the latter period, except where it may be expressly stipulated otherwise. When this act of simple justice is proposed, the cry of "repudiation" goes up. Members upon this floor have characterized it as "monstrous in the extreme." British creditors and their organs prate of it as "the grossest breach of national faith that could be invented." England, in her paternal care of her own people, deals more wisely with her colonies than she would have the American Congress deal with its own people.

The decline in silver and the causes which led to it have produced discussion and investigation in the British House of Commons. Growing out of this discussion a committee on the depreciation of silver was recently appointed by that body; and in a report lately made by it, which is pronounced a most able document and as abounding in great information and research, the committee gives its views upon the question in most clear and concise language. The London Economist most heartily commends this report, and from an extract which I will here read it will clearly appear that England would not pursue the same course nor advise the same action on the part of her colonies, whose interests it is her interest to protect, as she does to the countries whose people she desires to pluck. In speaking of India and its relations to silver money in the present crisis, the committee say:

No competent person can propose a demonetization of silver in India, and a substitution of gold for it, just at a moment when the price of silver has been thrust down by so strong an apprehension caused by such peculiar circumstances. It would be to require the Indian government to buy the largest sum of money ever bought in the dearest market for gold and to dispose of the largest amount of silver in the cheapest market for silver which ever existed. The present financial position of the Indian government is no doubt impaired by this sudden depreciation of the metal in which it receives its revenue; but the remedy for a minor deficit would bring in, in lieu of it, a deficit of the first magnitude; it would be nothing else but financial ruin.

Again, no one would propose to arrest coining silver in the East as a remedy for such a state of things, for this would only disorder the silver market still further. It would add a new political difficulty to those previous political difficulties which have caused so much disturbance, and so make the existing confusion far worse than before. Nor can it be maintained that the Indian government should now require the ryot, whose rent has been formerly fixed in silver, to pay either in gold itself or in so much more silver as would purchase the same quantity of gold as that fixed rent would have purchased when the settlement was made. If silver in India had become depreciated as against commodities in general, it might have been possible to say to the ryot, "You are selling your commodities for more silver, and therefore it is not unfair to ask you to pay us, the Government, a proportionate amount more." Even then the ryot would have been probably discontented; he would have said, "If prices had gone down the Government would never have let me off, and it is not fair that they should take the benefit of good times when they leave me the misfortune of hard times."

I may add in passing that the "ryot" is the Hindostan farmer, the tiller of the soil, the prototype of the American farmer.

If the committee had been writing of the United States in 1873, and had advised us as truthfully then concerning the silver problem as it does its colony now, the legislation of that year would never have been enacted. Let me change in this extract but the name of the country and a few other unimportant words, and, as we read it again, its full application to our then condition and the clearness with which it points out our duty will astonish the members of this House. It would read:

No competent person can propose a demonetization of silver in America and a substitution of gold for it just at a moment when the price of silver has been thrust down by so strong an apprehension caused by such peculiar circumstances. It would be to require the American Government to buy the largest sum of money ever bought in the dearest market for gold, and to dispose of the largest amount of silver in the cheapest market for silver which ever existed. * * * No one would propose to arrest coining silver in America as a remedy for such a state of things, for this would only disorder the silver market still further. It would add a new political difficulty to those previous political difficulties which have caused so much disturbance, and so make the existing confusion far worse than before. Nor can it be maintained that the American Congress should now require the Government, whose liability upon the bonds has been formerly fixed in silver equally with gold, to pay either in gold alone or in so much more silver as would purchase the same quantity of gold as the sum named in bonds when the contract was made.

If our own statesmen, wise upon the subject of finance, cannot direct legislation by their councils so that American interests will be protected in the financial maelstrom now sweeping over the commercial world, let us turn to England, whose statesmen are always sound when their own prosperity is in the balance, that we may profit by her maternal care and wisdom.

That the measure now under consideration will also solve the problem of a return to specie payments I cannot doubt. The best writers upon the subject of finance, giving expression to the experience of centuries, agree that with an amount of coin in the Treasury equal to one-third of the outstanding legal-tender notes, and with a like proportion of coin to national-bank notes in the possession of the banks, the redemption of all such notes may be commenced with safety. I can think of no good reason why the coin notes provided for in the first section of this bill should be subject to a different rule. For every dollar of such notes issued by the Government there would be deposited with the Government a dollar in gold or silver. These notes being redeemable promptly upon presentation and possessing the power of paying duties upon imports, all forms of excise tax, in short, as expressed in the bill, being "receivable without limit for all dues to the United States," would at once be subject to the same commercial law which controls the circulation and redemption of the legal-tender and national-bank notes of the country. If one-third in amount of coin will answer to successfully resume the payment of our present paper money, a like amount in fine bars or coin will assuredly answer to meet payment of the coin notes as they may be presented. By this method alone a large reserve of coin available for resumption would soon be accumulated, and much earlier than the most sanguine now anticipates would the equality in value of coin and paper be brought about, and the Government commence to pay over its counter the coin in exchange for its paper promises.

While this measure of justice, both to the people and the bondholders, will bring substantial benefits to the country at large, it will bear upon its wings healing and relief, particularly to the sections of our land producing the precious metals. Mines which are now idle because the profits of their operation have been legislated out of existence will once more yield to the business world their precious contents. Mines which for like reasons are now feebly worked would soon be moved by that vigorous life which produced the prosperity now departed. Low-grade ores would be taken from the dump, mines producing low-grade ores would be brought into the market, reduction, milling, and mining machinery would be brought into demand, and thousands of mining laborers now poorly paid or out of employment would be made happy by constant and remunerative work.

Although I cordially favor the general purposes of this bill in its dealings with the silver products of the country, in behalf of our great central mining region, not only of my own State but also of Montana, Arizona, New Mexico, Utah, and Wyoming, I earnestly protest against the injustice of restricting the places where bullion may be deposited and coin notes issued to the mints and assay offices of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I am aware that the bill as introduced did not disregard their claims and advantages, and that the committee uninfluenced would not have ignored this whole Rocky Mountain region by excluding the mint at Denver from the list of mints of deposit and issue. I also understand that the antagonism to our section has come from high quarters, the late head of the Treasury Department, and also from the Director of the Mint. The motives of these gentlemen it is not my province to question, but their judgment and sense of justice I most earnestly condemn. In the end, it is for Congress to say whether this wrong shall be carried into execution.

By the amendment which I offer it is proposed to place the mint at Denver, so far as the purposes of the bill are concerned, upon the same footing with the mints and assay offices at San Francisco, Carson City, Philadelphia, and New York. Why should it not be done? The interests of a larger area of bullion-producing territory than that tributary to either of the other points demand it. As great a mining population is to be benefited, and in amount of the precious metals produced the territory tributary to but one of the other points excels it. The topographical and geographical situation of Denver, its centrality to the mining sections of the Rocky Mountain region with reference to its railroad system, developed, completed, and under construction, establish the fact that the mint at Denver is an economical and essential element in the system proposed by the bill.

Arizona and New Mexico adjoining Colorado on the south, Wyoming and Montana to the north, and Utah on its west, by nature and the skill and energy of man, have become tributary to it in all their mining interests, and with the right of the mint at Denver to issue the coin-notes in exchange for bullion, the precious metals of these Territories would find their way to that mint as naturally as water in the rivers finds its way to the ocean.

The mistake under which many members seem to labor is that silver is alone produced from the Nevada mines and that gold can only be found in the mountains and gulches of California. Over $70,000,000 in gold and silver bullion have already been deposited in the United States Mint from Colorado and the five Territories I have named, and this is but a fraction of the amount actually produced. The amount of bullion produced in the same area last year is estimated at over $16,000,000, and the most competent judges estimate the yield of the mines in the same area for the present year at upward of $20,000,000.

Colorado alone produces bullion enough to entitle it to the privileges through the mint granted to Carson City and San Francisco. In 1875 the amount it produced did not fall short of $7,000,000, and the present year will bring it up to nine millions at least. These are the figures of sober truth. They represent the wealth actually extracted from the mountains and gulches of Colorado by the power of powder, the drill, the shovel, and the pan. If we might give credence to the stories of fabulous wealth which every letter and paper brings from the new mines in the San Juan, Uncompagre, Park, Lake, Summit, Clear Creek, Gilpin, Boulder, and Grand districts, the light of California and Nevada wealth would pale before its refulgent splendor. While these stories are received with caution as the outgrowth of the enthusiasm of prospectors and miners, who are hourly making new discoveries of the metallic wealth of the country which they are engaged in developing, yet I firmly believe they are but foretelling what will ultimately be found to be the truth, that in Colorado alone there are a greater number and richer mines of gold and silver than exist in any other like area of territory upon the continent.

Then why should Congress with one giant stride step over this vast empire of wealth in dispensing its benefits? Why should it and its people be ignored at the suggestions of a Secretary of the Treasury or a Director of the Mint? Why should the capabilities and advantages of such a vast area of auriferous and argentiferous territory be overlooked in the effort of Congress to utilize the products of the gold and silver mines of the country? Sir, it is to be hoped that not only the Atlantic and Pacific coasts will receive the benefits of this act, but that Colorado and her five territorial sisters will be thought worthy of like favors. It is their right; their right by position, by population, by mineral wealth, and by the grand results accomplished by the enterprise, energy, patience, and bravery of their people. Denver is the true entrepôt of all this section. Its seven lines of railway reaching out their arms fraternally in all directions and connecting with the great trunk lines of the continent; its banking facilities and extended commercial relations; its wealth and enterprise and geographical position at once establish it as the market for their bullion under the wise and beneficent provisions of the bill as I trust it may be amended.

PROCEEDS OF PUBLIC LANDS FOR EDUCATIONAL PURPOSES.

Mr. BLAIR addressed the House upon the bill (H. R. No. 748) to apply the proceeds of the sales of public lands to the education of the people. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. PAGE addressed the House upon the subject of appropriations. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

STATUTES OF LIMITATIONS IN RELATION TO PENSIONS.

Mr. MAISH. Mr. Speaker, an error repeatedly asserted during a long course of years without contradiction is apt to acquire the force and dignity of truth. Many legal and political fallacies have of late years gained currency by mere acquiescence. Our pension laws afford a striking illustration of this fact.

Attention has already been called to the extraordinary views entertained by gentlemen on the other side of the House upon the subject of pensions. So long had they prevailed in the councils of the country that great surprise was exhibited when first they were combated by my colleague, [Mr. JENKS.] Although the old doctrines were stoutly re-asserted, it was very apparent that uneasiness was felt when their soundness was questioned. They stood somewhat staggered at the presence of truth.

Pensions have been declared to be mere gratuities. A gratuity is a voluntary gift, the payment of which may be made or withheld at the pleasure of the donor. This, it is maintained, is the character of the pensions provided by the Government for the invalid soldiers and sailors and those who were dependent on the brave men who fell in the cause of their country. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] put his proposition in such pointed and unequivocal language that I will, in justice to him and the subject, quote a part of his remarks.

First, sir, I desire gentlemen to consider here that there is not and cannot be any such thing as a vested right, a commercial transaction between the country and those who are the recipients of its bounty. Every nation has the right inherently to command the services of its citizens just whenever it calls for them, to call for their lives, to demand their money; and the measure of the citizen's duty is only limited by the necessities of the country. There is no contract of dollars and cents in that. So whoever may render service in a military capacity to the nation simply does his plain, unmistakable, undeniable duty, and whatever reward the nation may give him for having done that duty is in the line of free gift and grace, and not in the line of contract. And until this time I never heard any man talk of any such thing as a contract between the soldier and the nation giving him the right to a pension.

This is a fair exponent of the sentiments expressed by the gentleman alluded to, and as they were allowed to be uttered unchallenged on that side of the House it is fair to say they are also the sentiments of the republican party. It is manifest, too, that these views have prevailed in the party that shaped the legislation on this subject for the past twelve years, for the laws during that period are filled with injustice to the pensioners of the Government.

My colleague, the chairman of the Committee on Invalid Pensions, Mr. JENKS, has successfully shown the fallacy of these propositions in an able speech delivered by him in this House some time ago, and he has left very little to be said on the subject.

There are pensions that may properly be denominated gratuitous pensions, but they are such as are provided by laws enacted after the service was rendered and had not been promised prior to enlistment. Pensions of this kind, however, constitute a small part of those now in force, and they do not come within the range of my inquiry.

A pension promised at or before the time the soldier entered the service is a part of the consideration upon which the contract of service is based. It is an obligation which the Government cannot honestly disregard without the consent of the party coming within the provisions of the promise, and is in all respects as sacred and binding as the obligation to pay the bonds issued to those who loaned their money to carry on the war. To disregard the debt of the one would be repudiation as much as to disregard the debt of the other.

The Government declared to its volunteers of the late war that, "If you enter the Army and become disabled in the service you shall be provided with a pension; and in the event of your death in such service, your widow and minor children shall be pensioned; and should you leave neither widow nor minor children, then your dependent mother or minor sister shall receive a pension." The person who comes within the benefit of such enactments can demand his or her pension as a right, and need not to supplicate it as a favor.

As early as 1837 Attorney-General Butler held that a pension was a vested interest, accruing on the passage of the law; and in 1850 it was held by Secretary Stuart that when pensions were promised by prior enactments, to use his own language, "they partook of the nature of the consideration of a contract."

Such were the views held by our statesmen in former days. It was reserved for statesmen of the republican party to maintain different doctrines.

True to the principles enunciated by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] that "every pensioner is constantly at the discretion of his Government as to the amount of his compensation and as to the continuance of his pension," the laws enacted since July 14, 1862, have been a tissue of wrong and injustice. The party then predominant varied, limited, and abolished them at their discretion, forgetting or knowingly disregarding the rights of the pensioners.

A brief review of the laws enacted since the war will prove the truth of my statements.

The first law enacted on the subject of pensions during the late war was the act of July 22, 1861. Those who enlisted and were wounded or disabled in the service prior to that time, it might be urged, were not, as a matter of right, entitled to a pension. It was, however, very properly held by Attorney-General Bates that the volunteers called into service for three months, in pursuance of the President's proclamation of April 15, 1861, and disabled by "known wounds," were entitled to pension under the act of August 2, 1813. Volunteers who enlisted for three years, or during the war, under the President's proclamation of May 3, 1861, and under the act of July 22, 1861, and were wounded and disabled in the service, were entitled to pensions under the act of March 16, 1802. The act of August 2, 1813, under which the three months' troops wounded in service were entitled to pension, extended the provisions of the act of April 10, 1806, to "all officers and soldiers who were disabled by known wounds received in the actual service of the United States," and the fourth section of the act of April 10, 1806, among other things, provided "that the pension shall commence on the day when the claimant shall have completed his testimony."

The act of July 22, 1861, merely provides that any volunteer who may be received into the service of the United States under that act, and who may be wounded or otherwise disabled in the service, shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the regular service.

As before stated, these invalids came within the benefits of the act of March 16, 1802. This act provides—

> That if any officer, non-commissioned officer, musician, or private in the corps comprising the peace establishment of the United States shall be disabled by wounds, or otherwise, while in the line of his duty in public service, he shall be placed on the list of invalids of the United States, at such rate of pay, and under such regulations, as may be directed by the President for the time being.

I have shown that up to this period our disabled and wounded volunteers during the late war had a clear right to pensions under laws existing at the time of their enlistment.

Next followed the important act of July 14, 1862. Its provisions were more liberal than any former acts relating to pensions. It granted pensions not only to the invalid soldiers of the war for the Union, but also to the widows and orphan children of those who died from wounds received or disease contracted in the service, and also, under certain circumstances, to the dependent mother and minor sister of deceased soldiers.

The first section contains a statement of the persons entitled under the law to pensions, in which are also included regulars, and specifies the amount to be paid. The second, third, and fourth sections contain the provisions in reference to the widow, children, mother, and sisters. They provide substantially as follows:

Any person named in the first section of the act dying after the 4th day of March, 1861, by reason of wounds received or disease contracted in the service of the United States, his widow, and if there shall be no widow, his child or children under sixteen years of age shall be entitled to receive a pension, commencing from his death and continuing for the widow during life or widowhood, and for the child until it arrives at the age of sixteen years; such person dying without leaving a widow or children, but a mother, or if no mother, a sister dependent upon him, she shall be entitled to receive a pension, commencing as before, and continuing, for the mother, during her life, or so long as she shall remain unmarried, and for the sister until she arrives at the age of sixteen years.

The fifth section provides that pensions granted to persons employed in the service "shall commence on the day of the discharge of such persons in all cases in which the application for such provisions is filed within one year after the date of said discharge; and in cases in which the application is not filed during said year, pensions granted to persons employed as aforesaid shall commence on the day of the filing of the application."

This is the only limitation respecting the time for making the application that occurs in the act, and it applies only to persons employed in the service. Consequently the act allows the widow, children, mother, and sisters to make their applications at any time, their pensions commencing and terminating as already stated.

Although Attorney-General Bates held that volunteers who enlisted under the act of July 22, 1861, were entitled to pensions under the act of March 16, 1802, it must be borne in mind that his opinion was given before the law of July 14, 1862, was enacted. Since the act of July 22, 1861, provided that volunteers enlisting under it "shall be entitled to the benefits which have been or may be conferred on persons disabled in the regular service," these invalids, I think, may claim the benefits of the act of July 14, 1862, embracing, as it does, persons disabled in the regular service.

We have, therefore, up to this period, and until the next law affecting the subject, the three months' men entitled to pensions for wounds received in actual service, commencing from the time the testimony is completed; those enlisting under the act of July 22, 1861, entitled to pensions under the act of July 14, 1862, which provides that pensions under it shall commence on the day of the soldier's discharge if application is made within a year thereafter, otherwise commencing from the date of the application; those enlisting under the act of July 14, 1862, of course come within the restrictions just mentioned, and the dependent relatives of the deceased soldier are subject to no limitations as to the time for making the application.

Thus stood the law until the act of July 4, 1864, was enacted, covering nearly the entire period of the rebellion. Nearly all of our great battles had been fought, and consequently nearly all the invalids and pensioners made. The provisions above stated are therefore the conditions under which nearly all our soldiers entered the service of their country, and they constitute the terms of the contract under which they rendered the service.

Now, in view of these solemn obligations on the part of the Government, I purpose calling attention to certain statutes of limitation that were afterward enacted.

The first attempt to circumscribe the operation of the former laws was made by the sixth section of the act of July 4, 1864, and it provides as follows:

> No pension claim now on file, unless prosecuted to successful issue within three years from the passage of this act, and no claim hereafter filed not thus prosecuted to successful issue within five years from the date of such filing, shall be admitted without satisfactory record evidence from the War Department to establish the same, and in every case in which a claim for pension shall have been filed for more than three years after the discharge or decease of the party on whose account the claim is made, the pension, if allowed, shall commence from the date of filing the last paper in said case by the party presenting the same.

This section was expressly saved in the act of June 6, 1866.

What was a mere fact one day became a precedent the next, and formed an excuse for still further encroachments upon the rights of those entitled to pensions.

On July 27, 1868, the following was enacted, it being the sixth section of the act of that date, namely:

> That all pensions which have been granted in consequence of death occurring, or disease contracted, or wounds received since the 4th day of March, 1861, or that may hereafter be granted, shall commence from the discharge or from the death of the person on whose account the pension has been or shall hereafter be granted: Provided, That the application for such pension has been or shall hereafter be filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto shall have accrued.

The section following this one charges the Commissioner of Pensions with the duty of giving immediate public notice of the contents of the above section, "particularly (to use the language of the section) at the offices of the several pension agencies." It will be observed this section includes pensions that had been granted, and, therefore, it restores to all such persons as its retroactive provisions would reach, the arrears of pensions excluded by the act of 1864. It may be interesting to note that this partial restoration of the rights of pensioners was made upon the eve of a presidential election. The reason for this sudden and active generosity, after such a long period of apathy, therefore becomes manifest. It is natural for man to feel grateful even to those who only give what they wrongfully withhold, provided they make the restitution graciously and quickly after they have resolved to do it.

We finally come to the law now in force, contained in the Revised Statutes. The section to which attention is invited is the following:

SEC. 4709. All pensions which have been, or which may hereafter be, granted in consequence of death occurring from a cause which originated in the service since the 4th day of March, 1861, or in consequence of wounds or injuries received or disease contracted since that date, shall commence from the death or discharge of the person on whose account the claim has been or is hereafter granted, or from the termination of the right of party having prior title to such pension; provided the application for such pension has been or is hereafter filed with the Commissioner of Pensions within five years after the right thereto has accrued; otherwise the pension shall commence from the date of filing the last evidence necessary to establish the same. But the limitation herein prescribed shall not apply to claims by or in behalf of insane persons and children under sixteen years.

This section became a law in March, 1873, and is in effect the same as the one contained in the act of July, 1868. It restored a part of the pensions excluded by preceding limitations and enlarged the barriers a few years more.

Here we have a series of enactments based upon the erroneous notion that pensions are only gratuities, and they are, as a natural result, harassing to claimants, unjust, and in some respects, wholly destructive of vested rights. They impose hard conditions; in some instances they make the commencement of the pension depend upon the efficiency of the Pension Office, cut off arbitrarily a portion of the pensions, and increase the degree of proof necessary to establish the claim.

A meritorious claimant who postponed making application during his country's dire need is made by them to suffer for his patriotic conduct. He who declined to make his applicatian while his circumstances required no such aid, but applied when poverty had overtaken him, found that his country's laws are as cold as charity itself. Disease and wounds do not always reach a crisis in a day. They are often slow in developing. The soldier wounded or diseased in service may defer applying for his pension in the hope that he may be restored to health before the pension would be granted. Such a one when he finally must apply probably will be rewarded for his praiseworthy waiting by the loss of all the arrears of his pension.

There was no necessity for legislating against this class of persons. The provisions complained of do not promote honest nor prevent dishonest claims. It must be borne in mind that, though the evidence is ex parte, it nevertheless must satisfy the Government; in other words, the debtor. It is sometimes urged that these laws were enacted to hasten the presentation of claims, in order to enable the Government more easily to determine them. This, I maintain, is not a good reason, and entirely inadequate for the wrong and injustice they produced. The evidence in these cases must be legal evidence. By no other means can a pension claim be established. The applicant alone is inconvenienced by procrastination. Evidence depending upon the memory of men is rendered more and more uncertain by lapse of time. The witness may have forgotton the facts once known to him; it may be impossible to find him or he may have died; and therefore the longer the claimant neglects to make his application the more difficult it will be for him to establish his claim. It would have been better for the Government and more just to the pensioner to have allowed the interests and motives of the claimant to prevail without legislative interference.

The reasons given in the Federalist in support of the clause in the Constitution forbidding the enactment of laws impairing the obligation of contracts are strikingly applicable to the statutes in question:

The sober people of America are weary of the fluctuating policy which has directed the public councils. They have seen with regret and indignation that sudden changes and legislative interferences in cases affecting personal rights became jobs in the hands of enterprising and influential speculators and snares to the more industrious and less-informed part of the community. They have seen, too, that one legislative interference is but the first link in a long chain of repetitions, every subsequent interference being naturally provoked by the effects of the preceding.

At common law lapse of time in no case constituted a bar to the recovery of any right. Statutes of limitation, however, have generally obtained in this country, and they have been held to be constitutional, even as applied to cases where the cause of action had already accrued, provided the opportunity to sue and recover was not destroyed. The courts have taken the view that such statutes do not impair the obligations of contracts, but affect the remedy only. We do not question the wisdom of these decisions, but even such laws we think are rather unfriendly to be applied by friendly hands to the soldiers. What we object to particularly is that the statutes under consideration have transcended these established limits.

Judge Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations, has so clearly set forth the line of demarkation that I cannot do better than quote his language. He says:

All statutes of limitation must proceed on the idea that the party has full opportunity afforded him to try his rights in the courts. A statute could not bar the existing right of claimants without affording this opportunity. If it should attempt to do so it would not be a statute of limitations, but an unlawful attempt to extinguish rights arbitrarily, whatever might be the purport of its provisions.

The provision requiring after a stated period "satisfactory record evidence from the War Department" is also derogatory of the contract, and is therefore obnoxious to the objections urged against the other provisions.

Justice Story, in his Commentary on the Constitution, observes on this point:

Whether the law affects the validity, the construction, the duration, the discharge, or the evidence of the contract, it impairs its obligation.

Now, if it can be shown that these statutes deprive the pensioner or claimant of any part of his pension beyond the power of recovery on his part, or so change the degree of evidence as to render him unable to recover, then I imagine it will not be denied that they are grossly unjust and arbitrary; a downright usurpation.

The sixth section of the act of July 4, 1864, required all pensions to be prosecuted to successful issue in three years in cases where they were already filed, and in five years in cases where the claim was subsequently filed, in order to be admitted without record evidence from the War Department. When no such record evidence existed, it was an effectual bar to the further prosecution of the claim. It in effect put the rights of the claimants in the power of the Pension Office, and made the success of the claim depend upon the dispatch of that office. The claimant's promptness helped nothing. The claim would, "like a wounded snake, drag its slow length along," until the three or five years had elapsed, and then, if through the ignorance or neglect of our inexperienced volunteer officers, or by accident, the record of the disability or death of the soldier was omitted, as was often the case during the early part of the war, the claim was completely barred

The legislators who framed the act of 1873 must have been conscious of the injustice of this feature of the section just commented on, for they incorporated a provision in that act which permits claimants whose claim would be barred to present evidence through the Pension Office to the Adjutant-General of the Army or the Surgeon-General of the Navy to remove the bar. It requires them to prove "that the disease or injury which resulted in the disability or death of the person on whose account the claim is made originated in the service and in the line of duty; and if such evidence is deemed satisfactory by the officer to whom it may be submitted, he shall cause a record of the fact so proved to be made and a copy of the same to be transmitted to the Commissioner of Pensions, and the bar to the prosecution of the claim shall thereby be removed."

This piece of tardy justice, however, did not atone for the wrong and injustice that was wrought by the act of July, 1864. It did not restore the rights of the thousands of just claimants who died between July, 1864, and March, 1873, who were excluded by the act. It did not alleviate the sufferings of those of that class that pinching poverty brought to your door.

The number of persons affected by this part of the section it would be difficult to determine. Those who had filed their claims several years before the enactment of the law had some chance of escaping the bar. Those, however, who had filed their claims recently before would not be in as good a position as those who had filed theirs within a short time afterward. The first would only have as much more than three years' grace as his claim was filed prior to the act, while the second would only have as much less than five years as his claim was filed subsequent to the act. The difference of a day in filing the application before or after the enactment of the law made a difference of two years in the prescribed limitation. This inequality adds only another proof of the injustice of this provision.

The same section declares further that claims filed for more than three years after the discharge of the claimant shall commence from the date of filing the last testimony. If the time consumed in considering the claim exceeded three years, which was nearly always the case, the pensioner was deprived of just so many years of pension as it took to adjudicate the claim; for, as has already been observed, in that event the time for the commencement of the pension was transferred from the filing of the application to the completion of the testimony.

This provision cut off absolutely three years' pension, and as much more as it took to consider the claim, from all invalids who were discharged between May 3 and July 4, 1861, and all who were discharged subsequently who had not heard of the act and had not reasonable time to make the application within the required three years. In these cases it was impossible for the parties to comply with the requirements of the act.

Those who were discharged in the early part of the war fared little better. Although they promptly filed their claims, they could not get them allowed in the short time remaining to complete the three years. Most of the invalid soldiers discharged during the Peninsular and Maryland campaigns I imagine lost three years of their pensions by the operation of this act.

Respecting the claims of the dependent relatives of the deceased soldier, this provision of the section operated still more unjustly. Claims in such case began on the decease of the soldier on whose account the claim was filed. Where a soldier died three years before the act of July 4, 1864, leaving dependent relatives entitled to pensions, they were absolutely deprived of the amount of pension aggregated between the death of the soldier and the allowance of the claim. This is also true of all such dependent relatives as had not reasonable time for making application. This, doubtless, embraced many claimants, for battles had been fought in Western Virginia, and the relatives of those who fell at the first battle of Bull Run certainly could not avail themselves of the act, even supposing the Pension Office had used the utmost dispatch.

The act of 1868, as was before remarked, had the effect to restore arrears of pension to such as were fortunate enough to come within the reach of its provisions. Those whose rights to pensions accrued before 1863, and had not filed their applications, were left without means to recover the arrears to which they were entitled. It also enlarged the time in which application could be made, without subjecting the claimant to the loss caused by the limitation. As the rebellion closed in April, 1865, few, I imagine, could avail themselves of its benefits, for at the time the act was passed the five years had virtually elapsed.

The act of 1873 is similar in its terms, and, having been enacted nearly eight years after the war, it could hardly have been designed to apply to soldiers who served at that time, because it expressly provides that application shall be made within five years after the right to the pension shall have accrued, and the act defines that the right, except in certain cases, accrued either at the discharge of the invalid or the death of the soldier on whose account the claim is filed.

A remarkable fact in these laws is that the pensioner's right was made to depend upon the time consumed in the consideration of the claim. It is a novel principle in the jurisprudence of the country, and it was passing strange that the experiment was made upon our brave defenders. Was it intended to punish claimants for neglecting punctually to supply the evidence demanded by the Pension Office? This is hardly possible; for it will not be pretended that claimants, eager to get their pensions, would delay furnishing the evidence. Even if they did, there would be no harm to the Government; but when we remember that the delays were always caused in the Pension Office, this feature of the law assumes a serious aspect to those whose rights are affected.

Sloth has been the bane of the Pension Office for many years. Claims were allowed to slumber there from five to ten years, and even longer, before being allowed.

Incapacity and gross irregularities, not to say crimes, were suffered in its management and were the principal causes of the evils existing in the Office. Investigation would have developed the fact that as early as 1864, when the first of these limitation laws was enacted, the claims then already pending in the Pension Office numbered about thirty thousand, and they continued to accumulate until in June, 1874, they reached the enormous figure of 66,700. Under these circumstances few, if any, of the claims could be reached in their regular order, much less completed, within the five years prescribed for their successful prosecution.

In addition to this the office was prostituted to political purposes. Clerks were removed by the hundred to give place to partisan favorites. We have the authority of the Committee on Invalid Pensions for stating that between March, 1875, and February, 1876, one hundred and twenty-eight were removed in this manner to give place to ninety-six new appointees. This has been done to a considerable extent at the commencement of every new Congress; the new members requiring their favorites to be put in the positions of those of the old members whom they succeeded. And this Department seems to have been made the foster-home of these congressional protégés. Newspaper correspondents were carried on the roll of the Office for years, received their regular pay, and performed no service for the Government whatever. It was the custom of the Office, as the late Commissioner Atkinson testified before the Committee on Invalid Pensions, to detail employés of this Office to act as clerks to the republican congressional committee. They were paid out of the invalid pension fund and rendered no service, and only appeared at the Office to draw their monthly salary.

Such a diversion of the pension fund is a crime punished by the laws of the country with fine and imprisonment, and yet it has been connived at and confessed by the heads of this Office.

Commissioner Baker in March, 1874, in replying to charges against him, made the following statement to the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House in reference to the cases of a certain Mrs. Barnard and R. J. Hinton. In speaking of Mrs. Barnard he says:

> She was appointed a copyist in the Pension Office July 1, 1871, as from the first district of Illinois. She never reported to the Pension Office for duty. The determination of several copyists, who were found to be fully able to appear at the Office for the discharge of duty, (Mrs. Barnard being of the number,) to do their work out of the Office, which was discovered simply to be a means of evading the performance of any duty whatever, necessitated the issuing of an order requiring all such persons to report at the desk for duty. This order was duly served on Mrs. Barnard. She never observed it. She was not, however, with my knowledge or consent, or that of the Secretary of the Interior, ever excepted from its operations; but persistently disregarding the order, she simply defied the Commissioner, and only came to the Office to draw her pay; while such work as was sent to her home was so ill done, misspelled, and generally incorrect that it had all to be recopied in the Office. For this reason I asked, in person, that she be dropped from the rolls. During this time she was the reporter for a New York paper, and had her seat daily in the reporters' gallery of the House, (a fact to which all the members of the Forty-second Congress can testify,) thus rendering service elsewhere when her time and services were justly due the Government. She was regularly paid, and had the conscience to take money for two years from the Government which she never earned, the Commissioner from time to time protesting against her course. Finally he carried the case to the Secretary, who, when the facts were fully made known to him, promptly dismissed her. She was upon the rolls just two years, and during that time she copied: July, 1871, two sheets; August, 1871, eight sheets; these averaging about eighty names each; and, as above stated, so incorrectly copied as to be worthless. (The reports of the head of the section, and the head of division, appended, marked "B," exhibit this fact.) This is all the work she ever performed in this Office. Her whole time was devoted to outside engagements and pursuits, leaving nothing to the Government except the regular visit on pay-day.

In reference to Hinton, he says:

> One R. J. Hinton was transferred to my Office from the Census Office June 1, 1872. Hinton had been in the Census Office one year, drawing full pay as a clerk and during the whole time had never rendered a day's service. He was appointed a clerk of class one in the Census Office, June 19, 1871, and paid from that date to May 30, 1872. I found his name upon the rolls of my Office; he never reported for duty, and never appeared except to draw his pay.
> From the beginning I determined to drive this class of persons from my rolls, I finally succeeded; and from that day to this, this newspaper correspondent has persistently assailed me in the columns of every journal into which he could gain admission. In addition to his one year in the Census Office he enjoyed ten months' salary in the Pension Office without rendering service.

These cases need no additional comment.

Mr. Atkinson, late Commissioner of Pensions, testified before the Committee on Invalid Pensions of the House that William Caffrey and John Stiles were assigned by direction of the Assistant Secretary of the Interior to act as clerks for the republican congressional committee. He said, to use his language, "that it was customary, as I understood by all parties, and hence was not considered improper."

One of these employés was in the service of this political organization for four months and the other for nearly six months; and the Commissioner testified that while they were so engaged away from the Pension Office they regularly drew their pay from the pension fund.

That it should not be considered improper to use the money of the Government to pay persons for party services is an amazing proposition; that the embezzlement should be perpetrated upon the fund of our pensioners is a gross outrage.

These things were being done while thousands of our weary, destitute, and maimed soldiers were awaiting the action of this Office.

This Office did not fall in arrears with its work, as might be supposed, on account of a want of liberal support from Congress. The fact is the appropriations and force were steadily increased from year to year, but under the corrupt management of the Office its working capacity as steadily decreased. It can be demonstrated that not one-half the work was accomplished in 1875 with more than twice the force and means than was accomplished in 1866.

The abuses I have just described I believe were merely the specks on the outer surface that indicated the rottenness within.

It was a mockery of justice to make the pensioner's rights depend upon the honesty and efficiency of an office managed as this one was known to have been managed. Its demoralization was accomplished through the connivance of the heads of the Departments in which the office is placed and through members of Congress, who made use of it to promote their selfish ends. This has been the work of those who claim to be pre-eminently the soldier's friends. We have heard loud protestations of friendship for the soldier in this House. I have shown what deeds this kind of friendship will produce. O, sir, a real friendship would have taken notice of these glaring abuses and never wearied until they had been corrected. Professions of friendship with these facts staring us in the face! They are what Burke used to call "the cant and gibberish of hypocrisy."

Mr. Chairman, I have shown beyond the possibility of successful contradiction that the pension which is due from the Government to the soldier is not a gratuity, not a gift, but a debt. The individual who owes a debt and declines to pay it is deemed dishonest by his fellow-man. In what estimation, then, shall a great Government like ours be held if it fails to meet its obligations? To whom do we owe this debt? To the soldier of the Union; to that class of noble heroes who, when their country called, when our institutions were threatened with destruction, thronged eagerly to the front of battle, willing to sacrifice home and all its comforts, to endure untold hardships; yea, even to sacrifice life itself. Let it be but suggested that the bonds of the Government shall be paid in greenbacks, not in gold, and throughout the length and breadth of our land how quickly would the cry go up of repudiation, how quickly would the voice of this people be raised in solemn protest. And yet when it was proposed, not merely to pay a debt due to the soldier in depreciated currency but not to pay that debt at all, we hear no such protest from republican members upon this floor; but instead we hear them talk about gratuity, gift, and charity.

Sir, it is an unworthy attempt to escape the payment of a just debt. Never, sir, while a member on this floor will I permit a great wrong to be done to the soldier of our country without entering my solemn, earnest protest. It was my lot to witness the gallantry of the Union Army. I have seen our soldiers, footsore and weary, upon the long march. I have seen them, half famished, cold, and wet, lie down among the swamps where brooded the deadly pestilence. I have seen them upon the field of battle maimed and bleeding and dead. I have seen them bear aloft the tattered flag which they loved; and I finally saw the remnant of them return home when the country was saved. As I speak to-day, I think of the army of cripples, of the destitute widows and orphan children of our fallen braves, and, remembering all this, I stand here and demand that justice be done them.

SOLDIERS' HOMES.

Mr. TERRY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Military Affairs have made a partial report in regard to the management and control of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, in obedience to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, directed to inquire into the management and control of the Soldiers' Home, and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and report in writing thereon; also, what reform in such management should be made for the comfort and welfare of said soldiers.

The committee recommend the adoption of this resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, authorized to continue their investigations into the management and control of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers during the vacation of Congress, and to ascertain what reforms in the same are necessary, and that said committee be authorized to make such investigations through subcommittees, who may visit said homes; and that such subcommittees be authorized to send for persons and papers, administer oaths, and do all such other acts as may be necessary for a full and complete inquiry into the management and control of said homes, and make due report of the same.

The purpose and spirit of the Government in the establishment of soldiers' homes is in keeping with that humane policy which has dictated the passage of all of our pension laws. It is to provide for the comfort and support of those who, in the service of their country, by wounds or loss of health incurred in the line of duty, have become incapacitated for self-support. Pension laws and soldiers' homes have become so firmly fixed in the minds of our people as proper and the duty of the Government, that it is too late now to discuss them as measures, but we must deal with them as a part of our public debt, which good faith and honor require us to pay. That gross frauds are practiced in the administration of the pension laws and gross abuses in the management of the soldiers' homes, will scarcely be denied, and to the correction of these we must address ourselves. Recognizing these laws and homes as just and proper, to enable the Government and to induce the people to fully perform this duty in providing for these classes of citizens, we should see that only those who are entitled shall enjoy the privileges secured by the law, and that honesty and economy are practiced in the administration of the funds provided for their support.

Four of these national branch homes have been established, and the rapid increase of the number of inmates in them suggests the propriety of an inquiry into the manner in which persons claiming these benefits are admitted. The following extract from the report of the secretary to the board of managers, contained in their report to the present Congress, (Miscellaneous Document No. 147, page 12,) will show the number now provided for and the yearly increase:

The total number of disabled soldiers and sailors cared for during the year ending November 30, 1875, at the four regular branches of the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers has been as follows:

At the central branch, near Dayton, Ohio	3,769
At the northwestern branch, near Milwaukee, Wisconsin	987
At the eastern branch, near Augusta, Maine	1,024
At the southern branch, near Hampton, Virginia	871
Total number cared for during the year	6,651

Increase over 1874, 592; increase over 1873, 1,626; increase over 1872, 2,019; increase over 1871, 2,341; increase over 1870, 3,133.

In my report of 1871 I ventured the opinion that "the number of disabled soldiers who require aid will not soon diminish, but will for some years to come steadily increase." This prediction has been more than verified; the increase in five years has been over 3,000, being an average increase of 600 per year, and making the total number cared for in 1875 nearly double the number supported in 1870. The increase has been principally at the central and southern branches; invalids seeming to prefer to go south rather than north, into a warmer rather than a colder climate. The southern increased the whole number cared for in one year from 324 in 1871 to 871 in 1875; and the central from 1,954 in 1870 to 3,769 in 1875. Indeed, last year the central cared for 887 more men than the three other branches together.

It seems from the testimony of one B. D. Whitney, which will be found on pages 20 and 21 of report No. 45 from the Committee on Military Affairs, third session Forty-first Congress, that each of the eleven members of the board of managers has authority and does give certificates of admission to the homes when found disabled by an examining surgeon; but this testimony of Whitney discloses the fact that he has been in the habit of giving certificates of admission.

He was asked his residence and occupation. He replied: "I reside in Washington; I am a clerk;" that he had resided four years in Washington "as a clerk" in the "office of General Butler and sometimes as clerk to corporations," and that in the absence of "General Butler and his clerk during the intervals of the sessions of Congress I represent the national asylum so far as giving transportation and examining soldiers." He further states: "I have to examine the thousand applicants that call at General Butler's office during the year to ascertain their fitness for admission." He further states: "I have books of record stating the examination of six or seven hundred soldiers that have been forwarded under my own examination," and that he had sent forward to the asylum within three years six hundred persons. Now it must be admitted that this is rather a loose mode of granting admission to these homes when an unknown and irresponsible clerk is permitted to perform this important duty. Protection to the public and protection to worthy objects of this national bounty demand that greater care should be taken in granting admissions, and that it should be exercised only by those whom the law clothes with the authority.

The act to establish the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers was passed March 3, 1865, and by the act of March 21, 1866, the means for carrying on the same were provided, which were: all stoppages or fines by sentence of a court-martial or military commissions; all forfeitures for desertion, and all moneys due deceased inmates of the home not claimed in three years, but subject to be paid to the heirs or legal representatives on demand; and the board of managers were authorized to receive all donations of money or property given for the benefit of the home. But by the act of March 3, 1875, this mode of supporting the home was abandoned. The money arising from these several sources is now covered into the Treasury, and the home is supported by direct appropriations by Congress, as all other expenses of the Government are provided for.

By reference to the United States Statutes at Large, section 4830, it will be seen that the board of managers are authorized to provide suitable sites for these homes, and only those are entitled to admission—

Not otherwise provided for, who have been or may be disqualified for procuring their own support by reason of wounds received or sickness contracted while in the line of duty during the rebellion.

Here we have prescribed the classes entitled to the benefits of the homes; and to secure a faithful execution of this beneficent design the law should be strictly adhered to.

The home has been incorporated under the name and style of "The National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers," and is clothed with all the attributes essential to a corporation, such as perpetual succession, to take and hold real estate, establish a common seal, sue and be sued, and to make by-laws, rules, and regulation for their government.

The board of managers is composed of twelve members. The President, Secretary of War, and the Chief Justice are ex officio members of the board. The remaining nine are elected by Congress. Section 4827 of the Revised Statutes provides that the twelve managers shall elect a president of their own number, two vice-presidents, and a secretary, but no treasurer to the board is provided for; nor is there any necessity for such an officer to the board. But when you come to the establishment of the branch homes, section 4829 provides for "a governor, a deputy governor, a secretary, and a treasurer, and such other officers as the managers may deem necessary." Notwithstanding there is no provision for a treasurer to the board of managers, yet since the establishment of the home General B. F. Butler has been filling the positions of both president and treasurer, and handling all the moneys that have been provided for the support and maintenance of the homes. Treasurers for the branch homes are provided for, and for them alone is such an officer necessary. But General Butler's connection with the home will be referred to more in detail hereafter.

The money provided for the support of the homes is as follows: Total amount received by the soldiers' homes from June 2, 1866, to April 1, 1875, $6,944,503.92. It will be remembered that the above sum was derived from fines, forfeitures, stoppages, &c., and from interest on investments.

On March 3, 1865, Congress passed a law providing for the future maintenance of these homes by direct appropriations from the public Treasury, as other liabilities of the Government are provided for, and to meet the expenses of the homes from April 1, 1875, the time when the act of March 3, 1875, went into effect, to July 1, 1876, Congress appropriated the sum of $350,000, which added to the sum above makes a total of $7,294,503.92.

Let it be borne in mind also that Congress by act of March 22, 1867, provided that every inmate of the home, on his original admission, should receive one complete suit of clothes as a donation; that by the act of June 10, 1874, Congress donated 10,000 suits of clothing; and by the act of December 31, 1875, 10,602 suits; thus making a complete donation of 20,602 suits; and add to this the suit of clothes given to each of the 16,590 inmates since the establishment of the home, and you have a total of 37,192 suits, which, at the moderate sum of $25 per suit, amounts to $933,800. This, added to the money received prior to April 1, 1875, and the appropriation of $350,000, makes the total cost of the home $8,228,303.92. In making up this amount I have not included the pensions received or the profits realized from the workshops, gardens, and farms, which is much more than sufficient to meet any demands for "outdoor relief," which the home claims to have extended to worthy objects, in pursuance of law, who were not inmates.

General Butler, in his report of the board of managers of the "National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers" for the year ending December 31, 1875, estimates the cost per capita for each inmate at $135.13. He says:

At first thought the sum of $898,733.44 is a large one, but it will be seen that, not regarding the amount expended for construction, and dividing it among the number of beneficiaries, 6,651, the cost per man is at the rate of $135.13.

The fallacy and error of this statement are apparent when it is remembered that 6,651 is the whole number of beneficiaries admitted during the year year 1875, when the average number present and absent during the year was 4,523, and the average number present during the year was only 3,683, only a little over half the number admitted during the year. Now it is evident that it is not correct to take the total number of inmates as the basis upon which to calculate the expense per head, for the average number present shows that many of the inmates were in the home only a short time, and hence entailed but little expense to the institution. If you take the average number present and absent, namely, 4,523, we will find the cost per head to be $198.70.

But even this is not fair. The correct basis of calculation is to take the average number of inmates present during the year, namely: 3,683, and we find the cost per head to be $244, which is $109 per head more than General Butler's estimate.

But in order that we may understand fully the management and cost of this institution another statement is necessary. Among the 6,651 inmates of the home 3,184 are persons who were drawing pensions from the Government, and hence were pensioners in a double sense. If you deduct the average number of pensioners present and absent, namely, 1,485 from 4,523, the total present and absent, you will find the rate per head per annum to be $262; and by deducting the average of pensioners present, namely, 1,193, from the total average present, namely, 3,683, the cost rate per annum will be found to be $361. This, it must be admitted, is rather expensive, and well justifies a most careful investigation into the management of these homes and the expenditures of the money provided for their support.

The estimates for the support of these homes for the fiscal year 1876–'77 are $898,733.44, but in these estimates no account is taken of the net profits of the workshop, which are $24,447.30, nor of $4,966.55, the net profits of the farms and gardens, which are kept up at these homes; nor of the further sum of $57,113.82 which is retained by the homes from the pensions paid to the inmates by the Government. To understand this I will state that when a soldier who is a pensioner enters a home he is required to assign his claim for pension to the home, which the home undertakes to administer in part for the benefit of the inmate. During the last year the home received on account of pensions the sum of $279,773, and disposed of it as follows: Sent by treasurer to dependent relatives of the inmates, $79,581.11; estimated amount sent by inmates, $34,220.68; amount appropriated by the home to its own purposes, $57,113.82; making a total of $170,915.61; leaving a balance of $108,857.39 This balance the home claims to hold in trust for the benefit of the inmates, but how or when it is to be paid does not fully appear from anything contained in the report.

In the testimony which was taken before the Committee on Military Affairs of the Forty-first Congress, it was proven by General B. F. Butler that while acting as the president and treasurer of the board of managers for the National Home he mingled the money that came to his hands as treasurer with his individual funds by depositing the same in bank to his individual credit, as the following extract from his testimony will show:

Question. Did you deposit this money?
Answer. Yes, sir; but not in the name of the National Asylum.
Q. Where and with whom did you deposit it?
A. I deposited it as money in my own hands, according to my residence at the time, sometimes in Washington as a portion of my bank account here, sometimes in New York, and sometimes in Lowell.
Q. It was a portion of your own individual bank account?
A. Certainly.
Q. With nothing to distinguish it from your own private property?
A. Certainly not.
Q. In what banks did you deposit it?
A. In Washington, with Jay Cooke sometimes, and in the national bank.
Q. In Lowell, with which bank?
A. In the national bank.
Q. Who are the officers of that bank?
A. I cannot tell you. I am there so little that I do not know who they are, except, perhaps, the cashier.
Q. Have you any interest in that bank?
A. Not a dollar. I wish I had.
Q. Is Mr Field connected with that bank?
A. Never, to my knowledge.
Q. Have you an agent in Lowell who draws or deposits in this bank for the National Asylum for you?
A. I have a part of the time.
Q. Who is he?
A. I decline to answer inquiries into my private affairs.
Q. I wish to know who is your agent, who deposits or draws money for you from the national bank?
A. I have no agent who does either.
Q. You have none, never had?
A. I have none.
Q. Have you any objection to exhibiting to the committee your bank account showing the deposit of those funds?
A. I cannot exhibit my bank account showing the deposit of this fund without exhibiting my private bank account.

Here we have the distinct admission that he mingled public funds with his individual funds, and positively refuses to make any exhibit upon the ground that he would thereby necessarily make an exhibit of his own private affairs. Was ever pretext more flimsy? He admits the wrongful act of mingling public and private funds and then seeks to screen himself from all discovery as to the use and manner of disbursing these funds because it would disclose his own private transactions. And a committee composed of a majority of republicans quietly submitted to this assumption of immunity from discovery, and General Butler has continued to this day president and treasurer, and defies discovery.

I desire to call attention to General Butler's connection with the purchase and sale of the property at Hampton, Virginia, now used as one of the national homes. General Butler's version of the matter is that he became involved in the purchase of this property in 1864 at the request of the Secretary of War, but that, the Government declining to take it, he was compelled to complete the purchase after the war for his own benefit, which he did by purchasing under a decree of the court, so that all liens were extinguished and the title united in himself; and that he afterward sold the property to the board of managers. This property had been the Chesapeake Female College, and was owned by a number of persons. Now, what the property cost General Butler is shown by a letter of Colonel Thomas Tabb, who was General Butler's attorney in the matter, and who in a letter to General Negley, chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, dated February 6, 1871, says:

The date of the contract purchasing the property from Messrs. Hume, Morris, Armistead, and Wright was June 9, 1869; General Butler had previously, namely, January 14, 1865, purchased the interests of Messrs. Cox, Salisbury, and Dennis in the property. By the agreement made June 9, 1869, General Butler was to give $34,200, less $12,000 which he had paid Cox, Salisbury, and Dennis.

So it appears from General Butler's attorney that the price of the property was only $34,200. Colonel Tabb concludes his letter with this statement:

I stated in my examination that the property cost General Butler about $40,000. My meaning was that it stood him about that sum at the time he parted with it.

January 14, 1865, paid Cox, Salisbury, and Dennis	$12,000 00
Interest on $12,000 for five years and six months	3,960 00
Amount paid by me as per statement rendered	22,662 43
Interest on $22,662.43, say six months	379 87
My fee	750 00
Total	39,752 30

So that by counting interest on payments and including the attorney's fee, an individual matter, the cost to General Butler was only $39,752.30, which he sold at once by indirection for $50,000.

It will be admitted that more than $10,000 was a right pretty speculation for General Butler to make out of these soldiers' homes when he himself was president of the board of managers and treasurer. He did, however, when the board of managers went down to examine the property with a view to purchase, have the modesty not to go with them, but sent his clerk, Mr. Clancy, who was at that time receiving a salary of $1,500 per annum as clerk to General Butler in his capacity as president to the board of managers, an office unknown to the law, and paid out of the means which Congress had provided for the support and maintenance of disabled soldiers. He declined to go in person to Hampton, but seeing he might effect a sale and realize $10,000 profits besides getting back in clean cash all the money he had paid out, principal, interest, and attorney's fee of $750, (because as treasurer he had the money in his own hands,) he made a sham transfer of the property to a facile brother-in-law of his named F. A. Hildreth, who was under obligations to him for relieving him from the penalty of imprisonment under sentence of a military commission. General Butler claims to have entered into an agreement with Hildreth by which Hildreth was to advance him $38,000, and he made him a deed, not a mortgage or deed of trust, but a deed in fee-simple to the Hampton property. Hildreth in his examination before the investigating committee of this House admitted that he did not require any such security for the advance; that he was content to take General Butler's individual obligation for it, but that General Butler without consulting him executed the deed and had it recorded; and then after the sale to the board of managers had been effected, in which Mr. Hildreth seems to have played a silent and unimportant part, he executed the deed to the managers and delivered the deed not to the managers but to General Butler; and to show conclusively that this deed to Hildreth was a sham to cover up General Butler's tracks in the trade it turns out that Hildreth never at any time made an advance to General Butler of more than $12,000. But I will let Hildreth speak for himself in regard to the deed and the advance. Here is an extract from his testimony:

Question. Upon making the deed, did you make him the advance?
Answer. I think not. I do not remember the specific time. I trusted the matter entirely to him. I did not, so far as I was concerned myself, care anything about the deed at all.
Q. You were ready to make the advance upon his personal security?
A. I was; but it was rather his choice to make the deed.
Q. And you say that when he gave you the deed you did not make any advance of money?
A. I am not certain; I would not be positive whether I did or not.
Q. Did you tell him you would not take the deed?
A. I think he had already made it. I told him I cared nothing about it.

It would seem that Mr. Hildreth was in the dark as to the real character of the transaction.

Q. Did you send it down for record?
A. He had done that himself. He did all the business.
Q. Did you ever receive the deed in your possession and keep it in your possession?
A. I did not keep it; I think I received it.
Q. It was shown to you and you gave it back?
A. It was shown to me and I think it was already recorded. I would not be positive about that. I paid very little attention to it. It was a matter I cared very little about.
Q. He got it recorded, then showed it to you, but you did not keep it?
A. I did not keep it. I would not say positively that it had been recorded.
Q. You made no advance of money at that time?
A. I may have done. I do not think I did at that time.
Q. Did you make any advances from that time to the time you deeded the land over to the asylum?
Q. I made advances to him amounting to about $12,000, between the time of that letter (May 10, 1870) and the time I made the deed, (October 17, 1870.)
Q. That was after the time you got the deed?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you know what you made advances for?
A. I do not know what he wanted the money for.
Q. And you do not know in how many instalments you made it?
A. I think about three.
Q. How much at each time?
A. I would not undertake to give the sums.
Q. How did you make these advances; by your check?

A. I think by my check or in cash.
Q. Are you sure which?
A. I am not. If I had the money in my pocket, I would give it to him; if I had not, I would give him my check.
Q. Did any of the board of managers tell you they wanted to purchase this property before you deeded it over?
A. No, sir; I did not know that they did.
Q. Did you have any conversation with any of them except General Butler about it?
A. No, sir. I wrote a letter to Judge Bond, I think, offering the property for sale. This was at General Butler's suggestion.

From the above extract from the testimony of Hildreth it appears that he advanced only $12,000 of the $38,000 he agreed to advance. On this point he and General Butler differ. The latter, in reply to the question, "Have you received all of it yet?" namely, the advance, replied:

I think I did and considerably more with it, and I have been able by the sale of property to re-imburse him for that and other money which was due.

In the above extract from the testimony of Hildreth, when asked what the advances were made for, he said:

I do not know what he wanted the money for.

The reply of General Butler to the following question discloses another discrepancy:

Question. But did you receive at any time altogether since that transaction $38,000 which he was to let you have?
Answer. He was to pay out in matters in which we were engaged certain moneys, and I received it in his account in that way.

It would seem from this that there was some sort of a copartnership between them in which Hildreth furnished the said advance; if so, it is strange he should not remember it.

But there is another still more remarkable discrepancy between these gentlemen. General Butler says that Hildreth received the money for the Hampton property from the managers, and Hildreth says that General Butler received it. It is certainly strange that any man could forget the receipt of $50,000, whether he was a borrower or a lender, especially as the sale of the property and receipt of the money had taken place not six months before the examinations took place.

But in order that the statements of these gentlemen may be seen and properly weighed, I will quote from them in parallel columns.

General Butler was asked:	Mr. Hildreth was asked:
Question. When the $50,000 was paid for the asylum property it was paid to him, all of it?	Question. Did you receive the consideration of the deed, $50,000?
Answer. Yes, sir.	Answer. No, sir.
Q. And you did not receive a dollar of it?	Q. You have never received it?
A. No, sir; it passed into his hands.	A. No, sir; I never received $50,000.
	Q. Did you receive anything?
	A. Yes, sir.
	Q. How much did you receive for the deed?
	A. I advanced to General Butler.
	Q. How much did you receive?
	A. I received what I had advanced. I think I had advanced altogether about $12,000, which General Butler repaid me.

Is comment upon this testimony necessary? Can any one resist the conclusion that the sale of the Hampton property to Hildreth was a pretense and a sham, intended by General Butler to cover up and conceal a transaction which he felt, to say the least, was of questionable propriety? Here was a piece of property that Colonel Tabb says all other parties had lost money upon, yet General Butler by a sale of it to a board of managers, of which he was president and treasurer, in a short time realizes a profit of certainly over $10,000, and this at a time when he had in his hands as treasurer $95,947. And yet General Butler is still the president of the board of managers of National Home and is still the treasurer, an office unknown to the law, and he still as such draws the appropriations which Congress makes for the support of these homes, mingles them with his own funds, pays over to the homes as their necessities demand, and uses the surplus on hand as he thinks proper. Nor has he ever paid interest on any balance in his hands; and for this neglect of the interest of the home the whitewashing committee of the Forty-first Congress offered the excuse that General Butler had never charged the home any interest when he was in advance. According to the report of that committee there had been eighteen quarterly settlements of General Butler's accounts as treasurer of the board of managers, and balances were found against him fifteen times and in his favor three times. The balances are shown at the close of each quarter, as follows:

1866—November	$36,060 53
May	110,107 92
August	41,837 21
November	74,984 16
1868—February	31,656 27
May	27,931 87
August	146,875 87
November	81,927 40
1869—February	61,626 49
May	97,256 92
August	56,173 94
November	8,671 30
1870—May	145,863 38
August	166,699 42

But balances were found in favor of the treasurer, as follows:

1870—February	$3,560 11
November	4,134 65
December 31	86,222 11

It is unnecessary to carry this branch of the inquiry further. The foregoing fully establishes the reprehensible management of the treasurer.

By reference to the foregoing statement it will be seen that at the quarterly settlement in February, 1867, there was a balance of $217,139.14. The settlement shows that during the next quarter, embracing the months of March, April, and May, there was expended $107,031.22, which left a balance in the hands of the treasurer of $110,107.92, which had thus lain unemployed for three months and perhaps considerably longer, notwithstanding the law required all surplus funds to be invested in United States bonds; and thus in this one single instance there was lost to the home interest on $110,107.92 for three months, which amounts to $1,651.61. But does any one believe that this money was in fact idle? General Butler could well afford to charge no interest on balances in his favor when he paid none on balances against him; and the wants of the home were not so uncertain as to constitute a good excuse for keeping such large unexpended balances unemployed.

In view of all these facts I insist it is high time that there should be a thorough overhauling of the management of these homes for the purpose of seeing how the public money appropriated for them has been expended, and notwithstanding more than five years have elapsed since the Negley report was made and since the evidence taken before the Committee on Military Affairs disclosed General Butler's connection with the sale of the Hampton property and the very handsome profit he realized out of it, at the expense of the very important trust committed to his good faith, he is still president of the board of managers and still as treasurer draws the money appropriated by Congress for the home and still mingles it with his own. How long is this disregard of law and duty to be tolerated? How long shall these provisions of the country's bounty be controlled and employed for individual profit?

A knowledge of these abuses and the improper management of the homes has induced this democratic House to direct the inquiry contained in the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and is hereby, directed to inquire into the management and control of the Soldiers' Home and the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, and report in writing thereon. Also, what reform in such management should be made for the comfort and welfare of said soldiers.

The Committee on Military Affairs, owing to pressure of business upon their hands, have not been able as yet to make the desired investigations, nor do they believe that they can be made thoroughly and satisfactorily except through subcommittees sent to the several homes where the officials and the complainants can be confronted. Since this investigation has been ordered by the House a large number of letters have been received by members of the committee and others making the gravest charges against the official integrity of some of the officers, of incompetency and ignorance against others, and of hardships and cruelty in the discipline and management of the homes. Many of these charges are of so grave a character as to demand inquiry, and it is the purpose of the committee to make it. I shall content myself in this connection to make only a few extracts from letters to show that the action and purpose of the committee in pressing the inquiry are well justified.

INSTANCES OF CRUEL TREATMENT.

Extract from a letter from Dayton, Ohio, March 24, 1876:

In reply I would say that my personal ground of complaint is illegal treatment by the management, namely, discharging me dishonorably without a charge or hearing, cruel and unusual punishment, and compelling me while awaiting re-admission to work without pay, and besides charging me for my board, and confiscating $48 of my pension as a condition of re-admission.

* * * * * * *

In regard to the financial affairs of the home I know but little except by common report. My position has debarred me from any personal knowledge of frauds, but I could see in the eastern branch where money was squandered in shovels full; in large and unnecessary salaries to citizen employés; in foolish expenditures on worthless lands; in building a race-track for the governor's private stud, besides keeping said stud at the expense of the home; the erection of a mansion for the governor which, I have been told, cost more than the barracks in which six hundred and fifty soldiers were packed like sardines.

You would hardly believe the stories I could tell of the treatment of men in these homes, and I refrain from writing it here. I have seen acts of brutality committed on crippled men which, if done in the Army or even in the prison-pens of Andersonville or Elmira, would have resulted in the shooting of the offenders. Such conduct leads to promotion here.

Extract from a letter written from Dayton, Ohio, March 31, 1876:

I was honorably discharged on my own application from the National Soldiers' Home at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, on the 14th June, 1872. I was admitted to this home on the 8th of September, 1875. It was three years and three months from the time of my discharge from the western branch until I was admitted here. Notwithstanding the fact that I was out for over three years trying to make an honorable living, and that I have a large family to support, yet when I was admitted here I was fined $18, which amount is kept out of my pension. I left my left arm at the battle of the Wilderness, May 5, 1864.

A great many similar cases have been reported, but I will quote only one other:

In December, 1873, I received an honorable discharge from the Dayton home for the purpose of going to my home at Philadelphia and endeavoring to procure employment to aid me in contributing to the support of my mother; but failing to procure employment, and also by reason of sickness and death in my family, I was compelled to again seek admission to the home, when the board of managers fined me $27 as the condition of my re-admission. Under the circumstances, I had no other alternative than to accept. I would state that while an inmate of the home my character has been good, never having been punished for any breach of discipline.

THE POLITICAL USE OF THE HOMES.

Extract from a letter from Montgomery County, Ohio, April 28, 1876:

The whole beneficent design of this foundation for the soldiers is perverted to party. They have all got rich at our expense and L. B. Gnuckel, secretary of the board, receives $2,000 for doing nothing. Staffs, revelry, and display is the order of the day.

Such communications continue to be received, most urgently pressing the investigation.

Upon the foregoing statements of facts and extracts from letters the case of the national home is submitted for the action of this House. These grave charges demand investigation. If true a remedy should be given; if untrue, the officers of the home are entitled to a vindication at the hands of this House.

THE CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, a people should ever aim to live up to the spirit of the great heroic periods of their history.

It seems to me the great want of the times is the spirit of fraternal, national unity, embracing in equal regard all sections, all classes, and all pursuits of our vast country which one hundred years ago brought together the inhabitants of America, scattered over thirteen separate colonies, without national existence or national history, and molded them into one people, and carried them successfully through a long and heroic struggle for the overthrow of arbitrary government. The oppression of Massachusetts aroused the indignation of Maryland, Virginia, and the Carolinas, and the people of all the colonies made her cause their own. The spirit of universal brotherhood pervaded the masses of the people, and struck down despotism, arbitrary power, and corrupt government, and established republican freedom on American soil. When the war of Independence was over, a few years of peace disclosed the fact that America was a political chaos, without unity and without any great central authority binding the States together and wielding the powers appertaining to a nation. American patriotism again arose, and the people assembled through their delegates and formed a Constitution and system of government which united all the States together in harmonious relations among themselves and organized the whole American people into a great political unity among the nations of the world. No sooner was the Federal Government created by these independent States, breathing into it life and authority, than all the discordant elements arrayed themselves in harmony beneath it. The Constitution gathered all the people together as one political family under its ample protection and overthrew the local jealousies and sectional passions and interests which had previously warred against the spirit of national unity. Supreme law arose and touched with its golden scepter the jarring antagonisms of the different members of the new-born nation and bound them in mutual accord.

The Union was created by living, organized governments, each regulating and controlling all the rights and relations of property and person. Each of them prior to the adoption of the Constitution had established in its fundamental law home rule, the rights of property, free speech, free press, freedom of religion, and exemption from imprisonment, except for crime judicially ascertained, as beyond the jurisdiction of the law-making power; and in the Federal Constitution they excluded the same rights from its jurisdiction. This Constitution was not made to destroy any of these rights, but to guarantee and protect them. It has now stood at the head of the American people for nearly a century and trained them in the ways of freedom and led them through a career of unexampled glory and prosperity and developed them into a power of the first magnitude among the nations of the world. It was made by the people and derives all its power and authority from their free adoption. Those who administer its functions must not set themselves above the people, but must be guided by their will, because its very life and being are derived from the principle that the will of the people is the rightful source of all political power. This is the great vital principle of our social, political, and industrial progress. Distrust of the people, repressive arbitrary rule, predominance of military power, denial or abridgment of the right of home rule, are at war with the whole frame and foundation of our Government.

When the central Government was pure, simple, and honest, and the State governments free and uncontrolled in the management of their own local concerns, and their people enjoying all the old-fashioned American liberties which their fathers won at Bunker Hill, Eutaw, and Yorktown, was there so glorious and happy a people in all the world in any age of its history? Why are they not prosperous and happy now? Under the guidance of the democratic fathers, adhering to the spirit of the Constitution and giving full scope to the generous principles of American liberty, we increased in numbers, territory, wealth, and intelligence beyond any people which history makes mention of. Our population doubled every twenty-five years and our territory spread out from ocean to ocean, and within all that broad expanse every one was protected in the peaceable enjoyment of all his rights of person, property, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. Order and security prevailed everywhere, and an ardent, patriotic love of America and her glorious institutions united all her people in one great brotherhood of prosperous, happy, and lightly burdened freemen. The democratic party acquired Florida and Louisiana. It abolished the alien and sedition laws and opened the country and all the priceless liberties of its institutions to the enterprising and liberty-loving immigrants from all the kingdoms of Europe. It made war upon Great Britain to establish the freedom of the seas and the equal rights of naturalized citizens. It developed and exalted the spirit of the nation and made its flag the terror of despots and the glory and the hope of the down-trodden masses aspiring to freedom throughout the world. It conquered Mexico and extended our territory away to the golden shores of California, with whose supplies of that precious metal it advanced the laboring masses of mankind further on the road to comfort and industrial independence in a few years than previous centuries had done.

If the acquisition of this territory, whose wealth renovated the world, was made the occasion for antagonisms to express themselves in reference to an institution which at the time of the Declaration of Independence was common to all the States, it was not the fault of the patriotic men who added that vast domain to the great inheritance of the American people. However correct in view of positive law the claim of the South might be to bring slavery into the newly acquired territory, its practical exercise was not allowed by the immense and rapidly increasing masses occupying the free States who desired to retain the territories for themselves and their descendants, unincumbered by that institution. Out of this contention, which convulsed the whole people in all sections of the country, grew up the civil war. Our civil conflict did not arise from the division of parties, but from the division of sections. All the people of the South, whigs, democrats, and men of every shade of political sentiment, and of every organization, social, political, and religious, united in the war for secession. And in the loyal States democrats, whigs, and republicans alike joined in the war for the maintenance of the Union.

It is therefore utterly dishonest and unjust to claim for any party exclusive credit for the mighty efforts and sacrifices made by all the loyal people, irrespective of party and above all parties, for the maintenance of the Union. I did not believe in the right of secession, because I could not imagine that Government, which is a wonderful incorporation of successive generations of human beings, embracing every complexity and diversity of rights, duties, relations, and interests, and requiring indefinite time for their growth, solution, and development, could be dissolved at the will of one or more of the parties to its original formation. In its nature, government must be continuous and permanent in order to accomplish the great objects for which it is instituted; and as the Constitution itself had not fixed any limits for the duration of American nationality, no limits could be implied from the vast and ever-widening and ever-enduring purposes for which the people had created it. But opposition to the spread of slavery placed the southern people in an aggressive position toward the Union; and, adopting the secession heresy of the Hartford convention, they attempted to secede and set up for themselves. When great masses of people, differing from each other on all other questions, are agitated by a common political conviction and manifest their sincerity by staking their peace and happiness, fortune and life upon the issue, human law has ever refused to treat them as criminals. Their views may be erroneous, but to them they must seem to be right. Political questions are complex and obscure in their causes, and conclusions in regard to them result from an infinite variety of details which the masses of mankind have seldom the opportunity to examine, verify, analyze, and reason out. In a government resting upon the will and intelligence of the people some allowance must be made for human freedom, even when it leads to erroneous conclusions. The remedy must be sought in greater intelligence on the one side and a more liberal and more beneficent exercise of governmental powers on the other. The law of force is not adapted to a permanent and constant place in a government based upon the fundamental principle of popular consent. It can only be justified by necessity, and should disappear when the necessity ceases. It cannot be made the normal rule of a republican government.

The war to maintain the Union should have ceased with submission to the Union. Although the war while going on was justified upon the principle that the Union was indivisible and that the States could not withdraw from it, but always remain amenable to its paramount laws, yet, when peace came, a new doctrine was started by men of narrow and bitter partisanship, who had been acquiring control in the Government, to the effect that the rebellious States were out of the Union, and that their people were mere unorganized masses of population, outside of the pale of the Constitution, who might be dealt with at the arbitrary will and pleasure of the dominant party, unrestrained by the principles and limitations of organic law. They held that the people in the rebellious States had not only forfeited all their rights under the Federal Constitution, but all the rights of freemen, older than the settlements in America, which were secured to them by their own State constitutions and governments. To this fatal error, now declared by the courts and admitted by all but the blindest bigots of party to be an error, are clearly traceable all the evils and misfortunes that now oppress and, to some extent, disgrace the American people. Here is the deadly fountain of unlicensed power which has filled the land with distress, peculation, corruption, and shame. Here is the cause of all our national woes.

The democratic party, and some of the ablest and wisest men of all parties, protested against this claim of arbitrary power, as a doctrine full of danger to the liberty and welfare of the people in every section of the Union, to allow that the Federal Government could exercise any power in time of peace in any part of our country over any portion of our people, except under the limitations and restrictions of the Constitution. There is no absolute power anywhere in human affairs. Despotism has no rightful existence in any code of human laws, and least of all under the Constitution and laws of republican America. Government is in its own nature a limited trust, and must be exercised, even over a foreign people added by conquest, for the promotion of their peace, welfare, and prosperity. This principle is as old as Christianity.

But the exercise of unlimited power over the conquered States gratified the rancorous spirit of party, and promised its leaders illegitimate wealth and perpetual ascendency in the control of the nation. The Southern States were excluded from any share in the common Federal Government, and the whole power of the Federal Legislature left in the hands of a few controlling States, to the lasting injury of all. The Southern States were not only denied their rights of representation in the common Government of all, but the spirit of the dominant party went further and overthrew all local political power within those States. Local home rule, the very corner-stone of our political system, was uprooted, and the Federal Government set up agencies of its own creation in place of State, county, and city governments chosen by the people themselves. The right of local self-government was older than the settlement of America, and was brought over by the colonists and enjoyed by them as the first element in political freedom and industrial prosperity. Under the charter of Maryland, for example, the people had the right to make their own laws and manage their own affairs without any control of the British government, which was prohibited from negativing the legislation of the colony or levying any taxes, customs, duties, or burdens upon the inhabitants; and all the colonies had substantially the same rights. To defend these rights and establish them forever in America, independence was declared and maintained with unstinted sacrifices of blood and treasure. The Constitution of the United States was afterward adopted to further guarantee and perpetuate these rights, and it contains no power whatever to destroy, lessen, or impair them.

Toward the close of the nineteenth century, in an era of general benevolence and enlightenment, the dominant party adopted as the controlling maxim for the government of the Southern States the ruthless old barbarian cry of "Væ victis," which the Christian world had abandoned for centuries. It adopted the wicked policy of breaking down all local governmental machinery in the Southern States and disfranchising the men of property, culture, and knowledge of affairs; the men who had the deepest interest in the good government of those States, who supplied their treasuries, bore their burdens, and had enacted, administered, and expounded their laws; the men who were carrying on all the diversified trusts and operations of society, and sustaining all the agencies and instrumentalities of civilization in their place and generation. Property and knowledge were stripped of political power, and rendered impotent and dumb for the public weal. Infamous laws struck down the original primary rights of American citizens, and partisan malice was triumphant over all the barriers of the Constitution. Liberty, property, order, and everything which is dear to freemen, were not merely made insecure but absolutely annihilated. Whole armies of corrupt political adventurers swarmed in upon the subjugated States and disorganized communities, not for permanent industrial settlements, but to usurp all public functions and exercise them for purposes of plunder. The whole South was placed under bitter partisan malediction, and set apart as legitimate prey for the unbounded rapacity of the political buzzards that swooped down upon it from east, north, and west. The conservative people of the country, who loved American liberty more than the domination of party, called out for the restoration of the Union and the rehabilitation of the States with home-rule governments and all their Federal rights and relations.

But the patriotic cry went out in vain. The suffrage was conferred on the freedmen, not to exercise it intelligently and independently under the home interests and influences that guide other citizens in the use of it, but as passive instruments, organized in solid unreasoning masses for the elevation to power of the political fortune-hunters who benevolently went down there to manage the affairs of the disfranchised States and enrich themselves by robbing the people. The sham governments were set up, and the illustrious Scotts, Moseses, Blodgetts, Claytons, Bullocks, Ameses, Kelloggs, and other self-sacrificing patriots seized upon the chief offices to heal the bleeding wounds of society and rebuild the down-crushed fabrics of home-rule governments. They organized plunder, and forced the people to call it republican government. Property became a burden and a grievous cause of offense. The populations of great States, and the works and institutions which had been built up through generations of enlightened effort and generous expenditure, were subjected to the blighting and destroying sway of the dishonest and unscrupulous "carpet-baggers" who rose to power on the ruins of the people, and were maintained in their despotic usurpation by the armies of republican America. Absolute impoverishment necessarily attended their rule; for neither the fertility of nature nor the industry of man could long endure the unexampled licentiousness of public plunder in which they rioted under the active and all-powerful protection of the party controlling the Federal Government. The barriers of law and public opinion were overthrown, and public robbery, unparalleled in the history of the world, was practiced without censure and without shame. The war-worn States were plunged in an enormous bonded debt, created for division among the despoilers, which hangs as an eternal incubus upon the industries of the people of that portion of our country. In time adversity, the monitor of nations, came to teach once more the everlasting truth, that Providence has set bounds to the rapacity of rulers; that when they overthrow the peace and security of society they put an end to production, and crush the hopeful spirit and destroy the boundless energy which animate and move forward well-governed communities in a steady march of industrial progress.

The freedom and independence of the States are essential to the purity and integrity of the Federal Government. Corruption and extravagance may be perpetuated at the center, if any political party controlling the General Government is permitted to enter the States and set up governments of its own creation over them, and through these sham governments control the election of President, and Senators and Representatives to Congress. These ready-made governments set up in the Southern States by the Federal power were the unmixed embodiment of rancorous partisan rule, irresponsible to the people, and necessarily engendered political and social disorder, administrative corruption, and business distress. Whenever the people are deprived of the right of American home-rule governments, made and controlled by themselves, all the worst evils of licentious power are sure to follow. It was a sad spectacle for the lovers of freedom to see the people of the United States (which had their birth in bloody resistance to laws not made by themselves, and were cradled and matured in freedom and independence) delivering up to corrupt and profligate political fortune-hunters that which the world had been struggling for from the earliest dawn of history, and which no people had been so happy as to secure in its perfection but themselves—the sacred right of home rule—their right to manage their own local affairs in each State by themselves, without the interference or control of any other power whatever.

As these Federal agencies were imposed upon the people in place of their own self-chosen home-rule governments, it became necessary to use the military to sustain them and to make that power which should ever be the creature of law, and not the judge of it, the final arbiter of civil and political controversies, and to substitute the decision of the bayonet for the political and judicial processes, which are the birthright of our people, for the settlement of questions arising under the laws. In order to strike terror into the people and silence constitutional resistance on the hustings and at the ballot-box to these corrupt and despotic Federal agencies the great writ of habeas corpus, the ancient palladium of freemen, which only protects innocence and can never avail guilt, was suspended, and all the securities of personal liberty were trampled under foot and the courts excluded from the Constitution.

I hope the fatal day will never come when large masses of the people will be so insensible to the primary principles of American liberty as to remain long attached to any party organization whose policy and success require the abolition of home government in the States. The liberties of the people should be more sacred than the ascendency of party. Yet it is made a matter of hypocritical complaint against the white people of the South that they are in opposition to the party which has pursued this ruinous and despotic policy; that they condemn and denounce this overthrow of free governments in their States, and this substitution of corrupt, mercenary, irresponsible Federal-made governments in the place of them. The radical party by this oppressive and licentious policy left no room for men in the South who owned property and who had been reared in the enjoyment of inherited American home-rule freedom, to attach themselves to its revolutionary organization. All who wished to manage their own village, town, county, and State affairs among themselves and to enjoy the simplest rights and liberties of freemen were necessarily forced to join any party which set itself against these violent assaults upon the very pillars of the Constitution. If the democratic and conservative citizens of the loyal States had not placed themselves in solid and earnest opposition to this home-rule-destroying policy and pleaded before the people for peace and equal rights, home government in all the States, and the overthrow of these despotic governments established by Federal power, could we have ever hoped to restore the equilibrium of the Constitution and unite the whole American people in one great, free, and prosperous nationality? If hate shall perish from the hearts of our citizens and mutual good-will and equal rights be re-established, it will be due to those patriotic citizens, of whatever party, who have preferred right to power or popular favor, and steadily adhered to the cause of home government in the States. It is easy to destroy, but the arduous labors of wise and generous men are needed to bind together the shattered fragments of the Constitution and rebuild the glorious temple of peace, harmony, prosperity, and freedom.

The democratic party has never held the colored people responsible for the social, political, and industrial evils with which the corrupt and wicked carpet-bag governments filled the Southern States. The suffrage was cast upon them without previous preparation, and they were made to believe that the profligate adventurers who went among them to make money out of political positions were their only friends, and that the only security for their freedom was to keep them in power. They did keep them in power until they robbed everything the white and colored men had and brought bankruptcy and distress upon both races alike. It was necessary to divide the two races in order to rob both, and the colored people were falsely persuaded that if the honest white people of their States obtained power they would reduce them to slavery and that the democratic party would approve of it. The falsehood continued to be asserted whenever an election came on, though the democratic party had pledged itself in its national and State platforms to maintain emancipation and enfranchisement, and to oppose any re-opening of the questions settled by the thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments to the Constitution.

The democratic party proclaims and upholds the equal political rights of all classes of citizens, without distinction of race, color, or creed. It has always espoused the cause of the weak and oppressed, and struggled by the overthrow of monopolies and governmental extravagance and corruption to lighten their burdens and bring comfort and independence to their humble homes. The democratic party never appeals to distinctions of race or religion, but addresses itself to the spirit of fair play and self-interest of all classes of society in enforcing equal rights and honest, economical administration of governmental affairs. Whenever a political party labors to excite the prejudices of one race or creed against another, it proves to the world that it is unfit to govern this free country, where such distinctions are excluded by the fundamental law from the field of politics as the deadliest enemy of the peace, fraternity, and happiness of the people. The republican party is again making a desperate struggle to blind the people to its gross abuses of power by setting the colored race against the white. It has been condemned by a large majority of the white voters of the country, and if the million of colored voters were to divide as white voters divide, it would be in a hopeless minority. Its only hope of success is to retain the unbroken support of the colored voters for all the frauds and corruptions of its administration. Hence every quarrel or act of violence occurring in any part of our southern country between colored and white men is welcomed as the stock in trade of corrupt partisans struggling to retain public offices which they have shamefully abused. The acts of violent and lawless men in New Jersey or Pennsylvania or any northern State excite no comment and raise no clamor for the interference of Federal power; but if such acts occur in the South, however local and personal to the wicked men engaged in them, they are seized upon by corrupt partisans, struggling to retain power after they have forfeited public confidence, as a pretext for choking American liberty and putting the ballot-box under control of the bayonet.

It is to be noted that it is only in the "carpet-bag" States of South Carolina and Louisiana, where home-rule government is abolished, that these outrages occur, and that in all the southern States where the democratic party rules the laws are enforced and the white and colored races live in peace and mutual good-will and are equally protected in all their rights. The democratic party abhors and denounces these outrages, which are utterly opposed to its spirit and policy; and wherever it has obtained control of the States it has put a stop to them. The democratic party cannot be held responsible for deeds of violence which occur in States that are ruled by carpet-bag governments and Federal bayonets. The colored people are intelligent enough to understand this and have ceased to be the dead, passive instruments of radical misrule and spoliation. They are as much interested in reforming the corrupt State and Federal governments as the white people. Neither can prosper until honesty and economy are established in public affairs. They will not any longer be used by interested, profligate politicians as a breakwater to resist the national demand for reform arising from millions of impoverished citizens, which will come and is coming, irresistible as the ocean tides; and whoever and whatever stands in its way must be swept out of its course. They begin to understand that they have been made the dupes of heartless adventurers, who have no regard for them but as stepping-stones to power, and that their interest and welfare are bound up with the prosperity of their white neighbors and employers; and we have seen them in recent elections uniting at the polls with the white citizens to elect honest men to office and restore order and good government as the only means of building up the waste places made by the common despoilers of both races and restoring industry, prosperity, influence, respect, and power to their desolated States. This was not possible while those States were ruled by the heartless "carpet-baggers," whose political elevation and opportunity for plunder depended upon strife and bitterness between the races, which they stimulated by the most shameless falsehoods, particularly on the eves of elections, when success required trouble to be made, and terror to be inspired, and the Federal Arm y to be set in motionand the habeas corpus to be torn out of the Constitution.

When the murder of free government in Louisiana aroused the indignation of the people and created a public sentiment sufficiently strong to prohibit the use of the Federal Army to control elections, and the carpet-bag governments were left to fall to pieces of their own rottenness, peace arose and blessed the land, ancient confidence between the white and colored races revived, the colored line broke, and intelligent colored men voted with their white neighbors and elected honest citizens to public stations who are now administering their State, county, and town affairs in the interest of law and order and of social and industrial regeneration. The monster evils of these dark, sad days of carpet-bagism are rapidly passing away, but the oppressive weight of their evil consequences must be felt for years. Both races in the South must still suffer from the enormous load of public debt piled upon them by their transient, greedy, and profligate rulers. It will require long years to pay off those debts and to repair the waste and destruction of the despoiler and to accumulate sufficient savings to set the springs of industry in motion in order to give abundant and well-compensated employment to the labor of the South.

The results of the disastrous policy referred to could not be confined to the South alone. Her impoverished people could not save enough to satisfy the plundering greed of her rulers, and her purchasing capacity was extinguished. Her hundreds of millions of annual earnings had always been expended in buying the products of northern labor and skill. She had been the bountiful customer which built up and kept in ceaseless activity the workshops of the North. Her wealth was annually poured in perennial streams into the laps of the northern mechanics, artisans, and manufacturers. During the war the vast demands of the Government supplied the loss of the southern market and kept all northern industries in profitable activity; but when the war was over and the Government ceased to purchase them, what course would patriotism, common sense, and enlightened self-interest have dictated? The manufacturers, mechanics, and laborers of the North have ever desired to supply the home market. They very naturally wished to supply all the manufactured products required for consumption in their own country. And in their efforts to improve their condition I sympathize with them, because in a republican government it is essential to the independence of the people and the virtue of the laws that wealth should not be accumulated in the overgrown fortunes of the few but diffused in comfortable competency among the masses, which can only be accomplished where the various branches of labor are liberally compensated.

By the policy pursued since the war, the millions destroyed in the South and robbed from her people were cut off from the workingmen of the North. Let these mechanics and laborers answer if their customers' means of paying are destroyed how they can secure a large and profitable trade. Tariff protection could not protect when by their votes they sustained robber governments in the South that destroyed the purchasing power of their great home customer. Tell me, workingmen, whose capital are your brains and skill and strength; was it better for you that the southern people should have had American home governments and managed their own local affairs and saved their countless millions yearly, and spent them among you in buying the products of your toil, or that they should be subjected to the rule of the corrupt and irresponsible agencies placed over them by Federal power, which destroyed industry and confiscated the income of property and labor by taxation that exceeded it? You are now able to answer whether it pays to indulge passion and follow the cruel behests of party to the impoverishment and ruin of any portion of our common country. Hate is costly; and now for want of a home market, for want of a wealthy customer able to buy and pay, the products of your skill and industry are cheapened below cost, reducing you to unwilling idleness. This is confiscation of your labor. You allowed confiscation of southern property and industry by upholding a rotten rule that robbed them of their earnings. Your property is labor and skill, and they are now confiscated in turn, have no value, can find no purchaser. From this we can learn that we are one people—one great, corporate national being—and that wrong and injury done to any limb or member will bring suffering and distress to the whole. We can see how the unbounded national charity of the Constitution, by which we give to all our fellow-citizens the same unstinted right of free, self-made, home governments which we enjoy ourselves, is at last the only means of securing our own happiness, independence, and security from want. That powerful spirit of national patriotism which declared and established independence in equal fullness for all parts of the country alike, and which framed and adopted our glorious Constitution, is still essential to the welfare and prosperity of the people.

One would expect, when the war closed and the Government ceased to be a customer for their products, that the manufacturers and mechanics of the North would direct their minds and energies to build up the restored South, their ancient and most bountiful customer. Here was their home market. Here was their wealthy old customer back again, that had enriched them before the war and that was now ready to purchase for the peaceful pursuits of life quantities of mechanical and manufactured products, equal in value to what the Government had consumed for purposes of war. Why did not the capitalists and mechanics of the North embrace the South and use their power at the ballot-box for peace, American home-rule governments, and honest administration of local affairs? Without these, society could not subsist, industry could not be revived, and wealth could not be accummulated. The man that sows must be made to feel some certainty that he or his will reap. He will not sow for the robber or the public despoiler. He will not save and accumulate where he cannot protect and enjoy.

In the South all the conditions of prosperity were destroyed. Those States were placed under the rule of the vicious, the ignorant, and the profligate. Men who had no interest in the communities but to plunder them were made governors, legislators, and judges. Society was subverted and the bottom elevated by armed power to the top. Intelligence was criminal and native virtue was unfit for the public service. Impoverishment followed as the sure result of the Almighty's decree that has made law, order, security, and virtue, the indispensable conditions of social and industrial progress. The heroic age had passed away and the great men, animated by patriotism broad as the country, who had guided our councils during the mighty conflict, disappeared. Narrow-minded partisans, whose small voices were too feeble to be heard during the struggle, crawled out in the sunshine of peace and crept into power. The inspiration of their statesmanship was hate and its methods force. They had no faith in the cementing power of equal rights, mutual charity, and self-interest. They were ignorant of the Jeffersonian methods of government, which teach that all just government rests upon the consent of the governed and that all political arrangements are devised for social ends, and must be wrought out by social means of free discussion, mutual concession, and forbearance, which accomplish more than force in reconciling the various contending views and interests that struggle for mastery in the minds and affairs of men. They believed the people could not be let into the Constitution. No suffrage, no self-made laws, no self-elected governors or legislators, no trials at home, no habeas corpus could be given them. The way to save the country was to destroy the Constitution and shut out from its privileges every one opposed to them. This system of hatred and illiberality has had its day; short in years, but of long duration in the calamities it inflicted on the people.

The evils which distress the American people are the clear and direct result of this misgovernment. Labor is the basis of all progress, the producer of all wealth, the bearer of all the burdens of society; and it is the first duty of those who wield the powers of government to direct them to its encouragement and the removal of its burdens and the augmentation of its rewards. Capital itself is but the product of labor, and when labor is overtasked and sinks under the weights placed upon it society has gone fearfully wrong and capital and all other interests are in danger. That society rests upon the most solid basis where labor is liberally rewarded, because its masses are independent and it escapes the oppression of overwhelming money capital on the one hand and the debasement of helpless pauperism on the other. But what have the eleven years of peace under republican rule done for labor? In what condition are the toiling millions of the United States to-day? From the day-laborer to the skilled artisan we find them impoverished, unable to find employment even at greatly-reduced wages. They are strong and skillful and willing to labor, but no one is able to employ them.

While production has ceased, taxation goes on and must be met. Consumption goes on; accumulations of prosperous times melt away; property, ceasing to be productive, daily shrinks in value. The proprietors of industrial establishments, who carried on the vast mass of daily work throughout the country, who invested in mines, mills, factories, forges, and lands, are discovered with the property idle and valueless. No one prospers but the owner of realized wealth. He is happy because all values have shrunk but the value of money, and that can purchase now nearly double the quantity of property it could a few years ago. The industries of the nation lie prostrate at his feet, and he may now acquire for a small amount of money properties which cost intelligent, energetic, and prudent men years of toil and sacrifice to build up. Things are in that condition when the rich can readily become richer and the poor must continue to grow poorer. The dream of the usurer is realized. He is master of American labor and American industry. In a country whose government is made by the people and should be administered so as to make them prosperous and happy we see at least two millions of the brave, honest freemen of America crying out for bread and going about from town to country and from country to town in the vain search for work to earn it. The homes of the American laborer and mechanic are in distress. The virtuous wife and innocent children suffer from want. The despairing husband can find no means of relief. He would give his heart's blood in daily toil to bring happiness to that dear home again; but go where he will his appeal for work is denied.

The Government of the country was controlled by venal and corrupt politicians, who disregarded the laws of social progress, who heeded not the interests of the toiling millions, who bent all the force of national legislation to despoil the nation's industries, and to erect on their ruins a dominant moneyed aristocracy exempt from all the burdens of the State. Bitter, virulent party spirit was invoked to blind the mass of the people and prevent them from scrutinizing the policy that in its full development has robbed them of employment and food. The gospel of hatred was preached to the prejudiced and unreflecting, in order to turn their minds away from the living issues and crying wants of the present to the follies or the crimes of the past. The opening of men's eyes is the work of time; but they are opening at last. Adversity is the great moral teacher and reformer of nations. This great teacher has come among the American people with all its impressiveness and power, and their vision is purified and their hearts are open to receive the truth. They can now see how the resources of the nation were destroyed, and why all its industries have ceased, and idleness in gaunt and hungry form stalks through the land. They can trace it to reckless and wicked legislation, which destroyed all the conditions of industry in one-half of the Union, and directed all its force to the perpetual ascendency of corrupt party managers and the undue enhancement of money in the whole of it.

While our national resources were thus wasting away, the Government continued to gather from the people enormous revenues unheard of in time of peace, to be squandered in the unnecessary pomp and extravagance of useless and corrupt office-holders. With half the country bankrupted by the rotten governments set up over the people by Federal power, the remainder of it could not long bear these crushing annual burdens of taxation without sinking under the weight. The aggregate of Federal taxes actually paid into the Treasury since the war is about $4,682,000,000, an amount nearly double the national debt at the close of the war. The amount of taxes which the people paid and which was stolen by the loyal partisans who had charge of the collection, before it reached the Treasury, is estimated to be at least another billion by the civil-service commission, which states that one-fourth of the taxes collected are stolen. With honest public officers and reasonable economy, the national debt should be nearly paid off. Less than a hundred millions a year for interest and $30,000,000 for pensions are the only extraordinary items required since the war more than before it, when about $60,000,000 a year was sufficient to carry on the Government. Certainly double that sum, or $120,000,000 a year, ought to be sufficient to pay the ordinary expenses since the war. This, with the interest and pensions, would make about $230,000,000 a year for all the expenses, ordinary and extraordinary, since the war, and the interest would be diminished each year as the principal was paid off. This would have left about $200,000,000 a year to be applied to the national debt, which in the eleven years would have nearly paid it all off. But in fact there has been paid only about $500,000,000, leaving the debt to-day over $2,200,000,000; and we are still paying the war rates of interest, 6 per cent. in gold, on most of it, and 5 per cent. on the balance, when no other nation of our rank and credit pays over 3 per cent. We have not only failed to make any proper reduction of the debt, though money enough has been taken from the toiling masses to pay it off, but we have not called in our war loans and reduced the war rates of interest. We should to-day have little or no debt to pay if we had an honest and capable administration of the finances, and upon whatever debt remained we should not be paying over 4 per cent. interest. The reduction of interest to 4 per cent. on the present indebtedness would save about $30,000,000 a year to the people, and leave it in their pockets to feed their families instead of paying it to the home and foreign tax-consuming bondholders, who pay no taxes themselves. After eleven years of peace we have as the result of radical misgovernment our whole people impoverished, our national debt unpaid, and the rate of interest unreduced.

The history of the world does not furnish a parallel to the financial imbecility of our administration, nor of a people who bore so patiently the criminal blundering of those who had charge of public affairs. The wonder is, not that American industry is bankrupt and American labor starving, but that they could bear such crushing burdens for so many weary years. The moneyed interests that control the Government do not desire the national debt to be paid off, nor the rate of interest to be reduced. They hold a mortgage upon all the property and industry of the people of the United States at a high rate of gold interest, and they have no desire to be paid. The security is good and the interest high, and they want it to stand forever on the shoulders of the people. These high rates of Government interest in gold compel the industrial classes to pay 8 to 10 per cent. for loans required in their business, and we cannot have prosperity in business until the Government debt is paid off or its rate of interest reduced to 4 per cent.

The laboring people should remember that all the taxes wasted by corrupt, idle office-holders have to be paid out of their earnings before they can spend a dollar to buy bread for their families. Taxes are the first lien on every man's earnings, and must be paid no matter if starvation follows. And they should also remember that every effort made by the democratic House of Representatives to reduce the overgrown expenses of the Government and lighten their burdens, so that business might revive and corruption cease, are resisted by the republican party in the House and in the Senate, and by the whole army of Federal office-holders. According to them, every filthy excrescence cut off from the body-politic, every dollar saved to the people, would destroy the Government, which they seem to appreciate chiefly as a means of extracting money from the people and enriching the office-holders and the money-owners. They refuse to recognize the voice of the people, which condemned their extravagance and corruption and sent the present democratic majority to the Hall of Representatives to investigate and expose their frauds, abolish their corruptions, and enforce economy upon all branches of public service. They refuse to yield to the constitutionally expressed will of the people, demanding economy, retrenchment, and reform, at a time when the revenues are falling behind the estimates from the inability of the country to bear the present crushing burdens of taxation. The appropriation bills reported to the House at this session are $64,362,116 less than was demanded by the republican Administration to carry on the Government for the present fiscal year and $38,516,312 less than the actual appropriations made by the republican party for last year. Even if the appropriations should be increased by the Senate three or four millions, it would still leave a saving to the people of about $35,000,000 made by the democratic House over the appropriations of last year and a saving of $64,362,116 from what the republican party demanded to carry on the Government for this year.

The revenues of the year ending June 30, 1876, fell short of the estimates about $14,000,000. And it is expected that the revenues of the present fiscal year will fall short of the estimates from thirty to forty millions. So that unless the reductions proposed by the House are agreed to by the party controlling the other branches of the Government, we must impose taxes on tea and coffee, or some other articles of necessity, so as to insure the collecting of these extra $30,000,000 or $40,000,000 from the people to keep the office-holders from feeling any part of the distress they have brought upon the country. We must either dismiss some of them and let them go and earn their living as the honest toiling masses do, and reduce the salaries of the rest, or impose upon the people they have bankrupted thirty or forty millions new taxes to continue them in luxury and idleness. The people cannot bear the present taxation; they are forced to economize and stint themselves in their homes; but the radical party and its pampered office-holders cry out against any reduction of expenses, and clamor for additional millions to be imposed on their suffering countrymen, that they may continue to wanton in their accustomed enjoyments. Their profligate abuse of public trust brought sore distress upon the confiding masses, but they are unwilling to suffer any part of the distress themselves. In any other government the office-holders would respect and obey the will of the people in regard to the expenses of their own government; but here the office-holders set themselves up above the people, and, while they hold on to the offices, fight to the last ditch against any reduction of their pay. The House of Representatives is the house of the people; it immediately represents them and comes right fresh from them. Its members are of the people, hold their positions but for a short term of two years, and have during that period to return among the people for their approval or condemnation.

The elections for the House are frequent and for a short term, in order that the people may always have control of the expenses of the Government through their own House, where they are immediately and directly represented. The Senate is elected for six years, and not by the voters in their several districts, but by the Legislatures of the States. They do not represent the changing condition and sentiments of the people, but frequently continue to represent interests and issues which secured their election long after the popular voice in their States has pronounced against them. Power easily slips away from the dispersed masses of voters, who have not the facilities for acting by combination and concert and whose prejudices and local interests often separate them; and the only way to preserve republican government is to uphold with a firm hand the constitutional powers of the people in their government. The martyrs of liberty in every age sacrificed their lives to establish the sacred and fundamental principle of every free government, that no money can be levied upon or taken from the people except what is given by them through their own immediate representatives of their own free will and accord.

In England the king and the House of Lords cannot take one penny for any purpose from the pockets of the people. They cannot add one cent to the appropriations given by the people in their own House of Commons. They have no right to amend a money bill and never dare to attempt it. The people of England are masters of the purse and the sword, and therefore they are free and control the policy and regulate the expenses of their government. This is the great foundation principle of popular liberty which was fought for through centuries and finally established as the very corner-stone of the temple. No people are free whose money and property can be taken from them without their own free and uncontrolled consent expressed through their representatives. Their own House of Commons, or House of Representatives, where the people themselves speak and act, is the only body in any free state that can touch one penny of the people's money or spend it for any purpose whatever. The Declaration of Independence was proclaimed and the war of the Revolution fought by the founders of our Government to establish this principle in America. Great Britain put a duty on tea coming into this country. The fathers of American liberty threw the tea into the ocean, and rose in arms against the claim of the British Government to tax them directly or indirectly. The British House of Commons was not their House of Commons because they sent no members to it and were not represented in it. To allow anybody but their own immediate representatives, elected by them, to levy taxes upon them and appropriate their money and property, they considered slavery. The immortal Patrick Henry expressed the deep and earnest sentiment of every American heart when he exclaimed, in reference to this tyrrany, "Give me liberty or give me death!" There can be no liberty where the earnings of the people and the bread of their children may be taken from them by kings or presidents, lords or senates, without their own free and unconstrained consent, expressed by their own direct representatives in their own House. Hence, when the Constitution was adopted this provision was placed in it:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

All bills to raise revenue, that is, to tax the people or to take their money and put it to any public use whatever, must originate in their own House, the House of Representatives. The President has no taxing power; he is to execute the laws and see that such money as the people choose to pay to support their own Government is properly and honestly applied. The Senate has no taxing power; it represents the equality of the States, not the people. The little State of Delaware has as many Senators as the great State of New York with her enormous wealth and her 4,000,000 of population. If the Senate had the taxing power, the small States not containing one-fifth of the population of the United States could put what burdens they liked upon the great industrial masses of the country. But the people alone can tax themselves. They are the makers of the Constitution; they are supposed to have as much interest in their own Government, and to know as well what money they can spare and what it ought to be spent for as any Senate or President. It is a fatal blow at liberty for officials to set themselves above the people, and assume that they are wiser than the people and have a right to extort the money out of their pockets against their consent.

The Senate can propose amendments or suggest them to the people's Representatives, but cannot coerce the Representatives of the people to adopt them by refusing to concur in any appropriations and stopping the people's Government. It is the right of the people in their own House to determine what amount of money they will expend yearly for their Government, and the Senate has no right to say to them they shall have no government at all unless they give more. In money bills the Senate has no right to originate any tax or burden upon the people and insist on it. An amendment may originate a tax as well as an original bill, and while the Senate may propose amendments, they are only in the way of suggestions, and it would be an evasion of the great fundamental principle of free government and the sacredness of the people's property if the Senate were to take a House bill appropriating a certain amount necessary for some governmental purpose and amend it by increasing the amount and refuse to pass any bill for the purpose unless the House agreed to it. This would be for the Senate to tax the people and not the House. The King and the Lords in England never reject a money bill. They accept them as the Commons grant them. The American Commons have as large a share of liberty as the English Commons. Can a President or Senate in the United States compel the people to give them all the money they ask to run the Government, or refuse to agree to any money bill and stop the Government of the people altogether? Is that supporting the Constitution?

The people are the best judges of what their government ought to cost them. If they are unable to pay for a dear one, or do not want it, it is their right to have a cheap one. It is not for the Executive or the Senate to force their money from them to carry out extravagances which they disapprove of. Such a course would be contrary to the whole spirit of free government.

That policy of extravagance and corruption has been condemned by the people. The majority of this House was sent here to reform and lop off all the rotten and useless machinery so long kept in operation by the radical party. Do the leaders of that party expect this House to forget the mission it was sent here to perform and adopt the condemned and execrated policy of the despoilers of the people? That party has had absolute control of every branch of the Government since the war. If it was capable of giving the people wise and honest administration, that would make them prosperous and contented; it has had the fullest opportunity for doing so. The tree is known by its fruits. What is the record of the radical party? What has it done for the peace and welfare and honor of the people? Official life at home and abroad scandalously corrupt. National honor tarnished under the very eyes of the administration. Venal and unscrupulous leaders selling the high and sacred legislative powers of the people. The lands and the bonds of the nation voted away to huge corporations, and the venal creatures who voted them away discovered with their share of the plunder in their pockets. Offices sold by men who had, or assumed to have, power to influence appointments. The money given by the people to support the remnant of the fast-decaying Indian race intercepted on its way from the Treasury to the Indians and divided among office-brokers and Indian agents, and the Indians left to starve and turn upon our heroic little band of soldiers in their savage madness and massacre them. Even the feeble reasoning power of the untutored savage held the people of the United States responsible for the plunderings of the officials appointed by their Government. The pitiful pay of the soldier, extorted from him through the machinery of vendible, high-priced post-traderships, finding its way back into the bank account of that Cabinet minister at Washington who was especially charged by honor and duty with the soldier's welfare. Even the Department of Justice, that should be pure and sacred, sending out the money of the people to intimidate one class of voters and corrupt another. Officers of the revenue in high favor with the Administration combined all over the country with whisky distillers to divide the tax among themselves and their political friends, and defraud both the Treasury and the people. The Secretary of the Treasury and the officers and attorneys who aided him in detecting the criminals and bringing them to the bar of justice, all dismissed from the public service, as if it had no need for the vigorous reforming hand of Bristow and his honest, zealous, and able assistants.

The Post-Office Department robbed by a system of straw bids, and the Postmaster-General, who was honestly laboring to break it up, asked to retire from the Cabinet. The little earnings of the colored people, gathered into the Freedman's Bank and its branches established through the South, upon the wicked falsehood that their deposits were guaranteed to them by the United States, brought to Washington and divided among a corrupt political ring, by which the poor, deceived, and defrauded freedmen lose about two millions of their hard-earned savings. Federal agencies substituted for home-rule governments in the States. American Legislatures overthrown by Federal bayonets. Industry broken down. Labor starving. Taxation oppressive. Intercst usurious. The public Departments swarming with needless Federal office-holders. They and the bondholders the only prosperous people in the land. Confidence destroyed by the general moral rottenness found in every branch and grade of official life. Universal distrust, doubt, and dread of the future. All business broken down and no basis of integrity for it to start upon. Social, business, and political chaos. These are the bitter fruits of the absolute rule of the radical party. Is it not time to stop and consider? Is not a change demanded by every sentiment of honor and every consideration of private and public welfare?

The party that brought on this distress is unable to relieve the people. It is unable to shake off the bad elements that have controlled it, and bring about the great reforms which the country demands. It has proposed no change. The last effort of its expiring power in this House was to pass the force bill, to perpetuate the terrible misrule it established in the South and again overthrow the civil, social, and industrial organizations that are beginning to take body and shape there under the healing and purifying influence of home-rule governments. That most wicked act, attempted to be forced upon the country by men who had been repudiated by the people, would have destroyed every germ of a restored Union and left the country in a worse condition after eleven years of peace than it was at the close of the war. If we have self-governing, peaceful, law-and-order-sustaining communities in the South to-day instead of organized anarchy and robbery supported by Federal bayonets, the country and the world are indebted for it to the patriotic endurance of the democratic minority of the last House. The radical party made a struggle that shook the country to pass that wicked and unconstitutional law and again overthrow the States and all the home-right-liberties of the people and reconstruct its own reconstruction and prevent all possibility of order, self-government, and industrial regeneration taking root in the South.

Let disorder and corruption be perpetual, so the radical party might retain power. Let the country perish in her multiplied distresses, so the carpet-bag government, the public despoiler, the spy, and informer flourished. Let civil governments disappear from the land and military satrapies under the gentle Sheridan and the honest Belknap rule over the people. Away with American home-rule-government. The Constitution could only be saved by destroying it, in the opinion of the venal and unscrupulous leaders of this party, grown corrupt and false to the welfare of society by long and unchecked abuse of power. Thus the nation would fall under the suicidal acts of its corrupt and incompetent rulers; they would destroy it to save it, and put it to death for fear of its dying.

Notwithstanding the enormous revenues collected from the people since the war, the party in power has left the country suffering under all the evils of a depreciated, irredeemable currency, and the only remedy it was able to devise was the resumption act, by which they bound and delivered the laboring and industrial interests of the country to the merciless power of realized wealth. With all the productive powers of the country broken down under the enormous weight of the annual burdens and the revenues rapidly decreasing from the impoverished condition of the people, they enact an impossible and hypocritical promise to pay gold in 1879, but make no attempt to fulfill it by economy, dismissing useless office-holders, reducing extravagant and needless expenditures, and saving money in the people's Treasury; but by selling four hundred millions of bonds, bearing a rate of interest to bring gold at par, and with this gold pay off the legal-tender circulation, thus adding at least twenty millions more gold interest a year to the present insupportable burdens of the people. Instead of lightening the weight that crushes industry, which is the fountain of all wealth, and thus liberating and putting in active operation all the industrial forces and energies of our people so as to create wealth and enable them to wipe out national, State, and individual debt, they propose to add new burdens, and thus banish the day of restored prosperity to a hopeless distance from the present generation. With about one hundred millions of gold to be sent abroad yearly to pay interest, even if we sold our bonds and bought gold and paid off the legal-tenders, every competently informed person knows the gold could not be retained here. Even the report of the bullion committee, which all the forced resumptionists make their text, states it as a settled maxim that gold cannot be retained in a country which is obliged to send large supplies of it abroad to carry on war, pay interest on a debt held in a foreign country, or the like. The stream of gold must flow out of the debtor country and the exchanges be constantly against it. This is an inevitable law. Hence if the legal-tenders were now paid off and the people thrown upon a gold circulation they would be left without any, and all business would come to a dead halt, trade and industry perish, and values melt away. Forced resumption is an impossible absurdity. The effort to force it may bring intense distress, destroy values of property, create bankruptcy, but cannot make gold appear. The puny enactments of legislative ignorance cannot destroy the operation of eternal and immutable law. The democratic party is in favor of hard money and of resuming cash payments at the earliest day the country is able to do it. But the policy of the party in power could never reach it except through general bankruptcy.

There is but one way out of debt for nations or individuals and to specie payments. That way is plain and simple: To cut down all unnecessary expenses, lighten the burdens of industry and stimulate it in every form, and thereby develop the wealth of the whole nation. Save much and spend little. Abolish corruption. Stop the stealing of the people's money. Dismiss the political bummers fed in idleness at the public table. Establish old-fashioned honesty and economy in public affairs, and the national industries will soon spring up to full life-giving activity, and make the greenback equal to gold. This is the direct road to speedy and permanent resumption of cash payments and business prosperity. Forced resumption by calling in the legal-tender is the destruction of the existing circulation without the possibility of maintaining a coin supply in its place. Contraction of the circulating medium below the wants of the people has been the most powerful agency of distress and ruin to nations and individuals. Plagues and famines have not produced such permanent and wide-spread injury to mankind. It was the main cause of the final overthrow of the vast fabric of the Roman empire, which in the time of Augustus, with a circulation of two billions of dollars, supported, without direct taxation or any serious burdens on the people, an army of 700,000 men; and in less than a century, with a circulation reduced to $400,000,000 could not maintain 150,000 men in the field. A few wealthy families had amassed all the money and turned it into plate and trinkets, and the mass of the people had none. Industry perished; lands were deserted; business transactions diminished; the masses were impoverished and lost all interest in the state, which fell an easy prey to its barbarian invaders. The feudal kingdoms in time arose, organized more for war than peace, and commerce and the industries of prosperous society were slow to revive. This system, with its innumerable burdens, lingered until the discovery of America opened to mankind a new world and regenerated the old. The mines of Mexico and Peru sent out their fertilizing wealth, feudalism melted away, commerce, manufactures, and industry revived, the people arose, independence grew up, and the rights of man were established.

An abundant circulation at low rates of interest is the great agency of social and industrial development. Says Bacon:

> Above all things good policy is to be used that the treasure and money in a state be not gathered into few hands. For otherwise a state may have a great stock and yet starve. And money is like muck, not good unless it be spread.

The vast production of commodities required by the wars of Napoleon created such a want of money that the world again outgrew its supply. The revolutions in South America reduced the product of the mines from fifty to twenty-five millions annually. Population and business increased, and money diminished; prices of produce and labor fell one-half. England about the same time undertook to resume specie payments by reducing her paper circulation, and her merchants were compelled to collect from their debtors in the United States. A period of the most frightful disasters to business and industry followed. In England the people were thrown out of employment, and the cravings of hunger overrode the rights of property and the fear of the bayonet. Half its wealth melted away and every seventh man was made a pauper, and 300,000 of her most industrious citizens sent annually from her shores to build up our own great Republic.

In the United States the fitful efforts to maintain specie payments, the alternate contractions and expansions, brought ruin to one-half the people and swept away over one-half of their capital. They did not starve, as in Great Britain, because we had a bountiful country and a sparse population. But our growing industries perished, and bankruptcy was the only mode of discharging debts. Prices were reduced over one-half and the value of all debts and liquidated money obligations was doubled.

The acquisition of California and the discovery of its gold-mines again relieved the world by raising the prices of labor and commodities 50 per cent. in a few years and filling the hearts of the people with energy and hope, and enabling them to wipe out national and individual indebtedness and start upon a new career of social and industrial progress. To these supplies of gold are due the unparalleled developments which we have witnessed throughout the civilized world in the last twenty-five years. Higher wages, better houses, better clothes, improved modes of travel and transportation, enlarged commerce, more churches, schools, and libraries, deeper knowledge and wider diffusion of it, wonderful mechanical inventions and scientific discoveries, saving labor and multiplying facilities for social and industrial advancement—all these are due to the fertilizing influence of the streams of gold that flowed from California.

Bloody and gigantic wars have been enkindled and fought out to arrest this magnificent march of the people to the promised land of industrial prosperity and independence, which would eventually crown them with political freedom and self-government: The Crimean, where Christian France and England impiously wasted blood and treasure to prolong the accursed rule of the barbarous Turk, which has blasted the fairest and most fertile portions of Europe and Asia; the war of France to expel the Austrian from Italy, not for the freedom of Italy, but to take a slice of Piedmont to herself; the war of Prussia and Austria, the Franco-Prussian war, and our own mighty civil war. The interests of the people are in peace, and whenever they learn to make their rulers keep the peace they will be prosperous and free. Five millions of armed soldiers are to-day arrayed on the continent of Europe for mutual slaughter, and the absolute government of the sword is established. The toiling millions must sweat and groan to furnish equipments and support for these destroyers of their liberties. This system may be called greatness, glory, or what you will, but it is the hopeless slavery of the people, the assassination of liberty, the death-knell of all hope of elevating the masses to comfort, independence, and self-government. In our own country the same spirit of military domination has been too apparent. But thank God all fears from that quarter are rapidly passing away, and profound, heartfelt, and durable peace and brotherhood are fast uniting the great masses of the American people this centennial year of their independence into one great political family of freemen, animated with the same ardent love of liberty, the same firm and generous devotion to home rule and local self-government as aroused and united their ancestors in the heroic times which consecrated this land to liberty.

Whatever may be the fate of Europe, I have an unalterable conviction that the great art of all arts, the art of civil self-government, is not yet lost in the United States. I believe the people will compel armed power to remain subordinate to fundamental law, and insist upon civil government by methods of persuasion, discussion, conciliation, and peace; the methods of Washington, Jefferson, Madison, and Jackson. There is not to-day in all the world a government supported by military force over a civilized people that would not make mankind more happy by its immediate fall. Wherever the checks and restraints upon power are in the greatest vigor, the people are always found to be happiest; and they should never allow demagogues, seeking power and place for their own profit, to excite in them those storms of passion that would sweep away the limitations on power, which are the safeguards of their own liberty, property, and happiness.

We must erect new bulwarks for the public liberties and strengthen the foundations of public virtue. We must make vigorous and unsparing war on that gigantic system of oppression, extortion, and corruption which has brought burning shame and unparalleled distress to the American people. The most vile and sordid passion is that whose object is to turn the public service into a source of private emolument. We have seen men high in public station who have given unlicensed indulgence to that most base of all the passions, and the party in power has failed to wipe out the disgrace. The rings and combinations that control its organization are more powerful than the aspirations of its honest masses for purity, economy, and reform. Those of its leaders who lost influence in its councils, or were dismissed from public service, were the Sumners, the Trumbulls, the Adamses, the Bristows, the Jewells, Pratts and others, distinguished for integrity, who earnestly labored to elevate and purify it, while those who ruled and robbed in the South, and those who suddenly enriched themselves in office elsewhere, appear to remain in good standing as loyal and worthy members. And if to-day the reproach of States governed not by their own people but by reckless adventurers thrust into power by misguided ignorance and armed force has been partially wiped out; if to that gang of public despoilers which spread terror and distress through all the States of the South has succeeded a body of public functionaries distinguished for integrity, disinterestedness, and public spirit; if in the various Departments of the Federal service fraud has been detected, exposed, and arrested, and the public criminals brought to the bar of national justice, the praise belongs to the democratic party and those pure and independent men of the republican party who, when party lagged behind the interests of the country, broke its paltry chains and set their faces against all that was rancorous and malignant in the angry passions of absurd partisanship, and endeavored to convert violent and virulent recrimination into peace, harmony, and affection.

The mighty movement of events sweeps along and opens up new worlds of wants and duties on every side of us. It would be absurd and criminal folly to waste life and opportunity in virulent and profitless contentions over what has passed from our control and gone into history. We have no moral or political right to torment or wrong each other. As men and as citizens earnestly desiring the honor and advancement of our country, we must dismiss party virulence and absurd prejudice and bring fair and candid minds to the consideration of the solemn duties and urgent needs of the day and the hour. We have a great and glorious country, with institutions instinct with liberty and fraternity, and deserving the intensest love and devotion of all her children. Her claims upon us rise high above the paltry insignificance of party. That there are enormous evils to be redressed no man will deny. It is now in the power of the people to correct them. The great question is presented to them whether the interests and the honor of the country do not require a change of policy? The public service is not pure. It must be reformed. Corruptions were known to exist, but the party in power did not investigate, expose, or correct them. The people demanded an examination of the accounts and doings of their servants, and sent an opposition majority to this House to make it, and the work has been done and the result is before the country.

Every honest and disinterested American citizen feels in his heart that corruption has abounded, and that it must be abolished, and that the whole conduct and policy of the Administration must be changed and reformed. How is business to revive, how is confidence among men to be restored; how are the criminal extravagances of public expenditure to be reduced; how are the idle politicians on the payrolls of the people to be turned out to do honest work for honest livings; how are purity and economy to be re-established and the crushing burdens of the people to be lightened unless we have an immediate and thorough change of policy? We cannot have this change of policy, which every business interest and every just and honorable sentiment demands, without a change of party. We are told not to put new wine in old bottles. The reforming and purifying spirit of the people cannot sweep away the abuses and corruptions that have shamed and impoverished the land through the agency of the men who caused them or suffered them to grow up.

All the rings and jobbers, office-brokers and office-holders, indorse all that has been done by the present Administration; and the same influences that gave them predominance in this, will give them similar control of any administration put in power by their party. They have flourished under General Grant, and we are not informed that Governor Hayes is more honest, or possesses a stronger will than General Grant. The same combinations and influences that control this Administration nominated Governor Hayes and will be uppermost in his. We have tried all the strategies, devices, and remedies of the republican party for eleven years of peace, and it has proved itself incapable to give honest money or honest government to the people. We have at the bidding of that party stirred up all the base and virulent passions of the human heart to set one citizen against another and destroy all charity and fraternity between our fellow-countrymen, and this, too, has failed to make the honest masses of our people either prosperous or happy.

The supreme necessity of the hour is economy and reform in the public service, and the complete, full, and perfect restoration of harmony and affection among all the people of every section and every color. To accomplish this is the great national work that lies before the American people this centennial year—to restore, re-establish, and re-invigorate all the principles of union and harmony and all the privileges and franchises for which their ancestors struggled and died in 1776. Corruption, which taints and destroys the noblest works of God and man, must be rooted out of the body politic. It must be made odious and infamous. There must be no toleration for the man who defiles himself and disgraces the high and honorable service of the American people by receiving bribes or making merchandise of public offices or stealing public money. The crime is too base and filthy and too fruitful of evil consequences to be longer endured. Corruption is the greatest of all evils in public affairs, because it saps the foundation of public liberty and law; poisons the purity and integrity that are essential qualifications for any share in public affairs; encourages all manner of vices, dissipation, and dishonesty, and fills the country with broods of degenerate, false, and fraudulent officials and parasites who give a low, base tone to public life, which should ever be kept high and honorable in fact and in the estimation of the people.

We have a magnificent country endowed by the Creator with all the gifts and treasures that fit it to be the home of a prosperous and mighty people. We possess the same identical soil that was consecrated to equal liberty and universal fraternity by the heroic deeds of 1776. We have a constitution and form of government that excites at once the admiration and the envy of the world. The same sublime and generous sentiments which the spirit of liberty breathed into the founders of this wonderful system of government, this mightiest and most beneficent product of human wisdom, should fill our souls and inspire our conduct in administering it in our day and perpetuating it for those who shall hereafter, to the end of time, inherit the name, the fame, and the unexampled liberties and institutions of the American people. We must live up to the spirit of the founders, and take no step on the road to degeneracy. Our country needs to-day that fraternity, unity, and disinterested, all-embracing patriotism and public virtue which redeemed it from British subjugation in 1776. The people must drink in the purifying and ennobling spirit of those days and learn to love their country above everything but God who gave it to them. They must learn that party sinks into absolute insignificance in the presence of their country. We have had too much zeal for party and too little for the honor and welfare of the country.

The people have abated too much from that eternal vigilance which Jefferson teaches us is the price of liberty, and have surrendered their own honest judgments and impulses to the ties and trammels and behests of party. But the evidence of the last two years proves that now, when they see and feel that the unchecked power of party produces distress, corruption, and shame, and that those party managers have been restrained from their excesses by no scruples or fears, deterred by no sense of duty or feeling for the honor and welfare of the country, instructed by no experience or calamities brought about by their wicked policy, the people will rise up in the full majesty of American freemen and, defying the dictation of corrupt rings and factions, inaugurate those changes and reforms that will re-infuse into the administration of public affairs that spirit of generous patriotism, disinterestedness, virtue, and economy which will be worthy of the descendants of the heroes and patriots of 1776, and which will put an end to strife and recrimination by securing full and equal liberty to every member of the great American family, and bless the land once more with restored happiness, industry, and prosperity.

The American people have now to settle the destiny of their country and its institutions for four years, and it may be for more. I do not think the people will continue to bear the burdens and the wrongs of the present corrupt monopoly and ring-ruled administration. They have a man before them for the head of their government distinguished for smashing up political rings, and exposing and overthrowing corruption, whether practiced by friends or enemies—a man of immovable resolution, who will boldly and fearlessly execute the decree of the American people to clean out the Augean stables of Federal administration. They all know who he is. The magnificent triumph of the spirit of peace, equal right, and fraternal love, is close at hand, and the labors and sacrifices of those generous statesmen, who separated from party when it ceased to represent the interests and the aspirations of the people, will be rewarded with the plaudits of their country, and celebrated in history with those illustrious men who led the American people in 1776 to victory over despotic government. They ever remind me of that small band of world-renowned men who in the British Parliament, during the struggle for American Independence, withstood the frowns of royalty, the insolence of power, and the passion of the mob, in defense of American liberty. The king arraigned in the Declaration of Independence the ministers who advised him, the parliamentary majorities who enacted all their despotic measures, and the ignorant populace who sustained them, are gone into oblivion, while Burke and Fox and Sheridan and the small but glorious band who followed their lead have taken their places as fixed stars, to shine forever with imperishable luster in the moral and intellectual world.

When I reflect on this and other examples in history I feel that the world has not yet come to an end; that virtue and liberty are not dead, and that however strong the rule of rings and monopolies may seem to be, they are sooner or later blown away by the breath of an aroused and indignant people. I feel that the spirit of liberty still survives and is the mightiest power that rules the hearts of free-born men, and that those who devote their talents to the invasions of popular rights and the cause of corruption are sure to be buried in oblivion, and that as passion subsides, the people turn away from the false leaders that have brought upon them distress and shame and recognize the necessity of having men distinguished for virtue, public spirit, disinterestedness, and integrity in the management of public affairs.

CIVIL LIBERTY AND GENERAL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky, next addressed the House on the character of the Government and the general state of the country. [His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

TAXATION ON CIRCULATION OF STATE BANKS.

Mr. ROBERTS. Mr. Speaker, although I may not now reasonably hope to see any action taken at the present session upon the bill (H. R. No. 3727) which I introduced on the 13th of June last for the purpose of reducing the tax on the circulation of State banks to an amount equal to that paid by national banks, I shall yet be entirely content if I succeed in calling the attention of the House and of the country to the importance of a subject which, in my opinion, has not received the attention to which it is entitled, either as an abstract question of right or as a question out of which would result great good to the people of this country, if treated independently of partisan considerations and with a view to multiplying the means by which the country may hope to escape from its present distressed condition. I do not therefore propose at this time an extended argument upon this subject, but shall confine myself to a brief statement of my views upon the leading questions which it presents, and which are:

First. Is not the imposition of a tax of 10 per cent. on State bank circulation, while the national banks pay but 1 per cent., a most unjust discrimination, and practically a destruction of certain of the reserved rights of the several States of the Union, which can neither be safely commended nor successfully defended, especially in a time of peace; and Secondly. Does not sound policy dictate the propriety of relieving the State banks of this burden and enabling them to stand in all respects upon an equal footing with the national banks?

Great credit is unquestionably due, and almost universally conceded, to the master-mind that conceived and carried into successful operation the present system of governmental finances, which was made to subserve the immediate wants and exigencies of the war, even though he was at times compelled to apply the doubtful principle that "the end justifies the means," and even though he clearly foresaw that the dawn of peace would lift the veil which but dimly concealed the impoverished condition and the financial distress of the whole country. As parts of that system came the present national banking associations, which were the national outgrowth of the embarrassments necessarily accompanying the recent conflict, and in this respect not unlike the Bank of Venice, the first establishment of the kind in Europe, which was founded in 1171; and like also the Bank of England, established in 1694, both of which owed their existence to the burdens of war and the necessity of the government's providing the necessary means to meet the same; and in each instance they became to their respective governments what the heart is to the animal organism, supplying the vitalizing power by which their preservation was secured.

To a proper comprehension of the character of the tax by which the State banks ceased to exist and the national banks grew into successful operation, it will be necessary to present a brief history of the legislation relating to the subject.

On the 25th of February, 1863, the act authorizing national banking associations was passed, by which a tax of 2 per cent. annually was imposed on the circulation of the associations authorized by it, and by the act of March 3, 1863, a tax of 1 per cent. annually was imposed on the circulation of State banks in certain proportions to their capital, and of 2 per cent. on the excess, and the tax on the national associations was reduced to the same rates. By the act of June 3, 1864, which was substituted for the act of February 25, 1863, the rate of tax on the circulation of the associations was continued and applied to the whole amount of it, and the shares of their stockholders were also subjected to taxation by the States. Then followed quickly the act of June 30, 1864, by which the tax on the circulation of the State banks was continued at the same annual rate of 1 per cent., to be paid in monthly installments of $\frac{1}{12}$ of 1 per cent., with monthly reports from each State bank of the extent of its circulation. The object which the Government had in view became now clearly manifest, which was to keep itself informed as to the extent and character of the paper money in circulation with a view to its ultimate regulation by act of Congress. Indeed, Congress had so early as July 17, 1862, passed an act prohibiting the issue and circulation of notes under $1 by any person or corporation.

The next step taken by the Government was a bold effort to obtain the absolute control of the whole currency of the country, and at the same time to compel the State banks to withdraw their circulation and organize under the national system, and thereby become the purchasers through necessity of Government bonds. This was accomplished by the act of March 3, 1865, which was amendatory of the previous internal-revenue acts, and contained the provision—

That every national banking association, State bank, or State banking association shall pay a tax of 10 per cent. on the amount of the notes of any State bank or State banking association paid out by them after the 1st day of July, 1866.

This provision was re-enacted on the 13th day of July, 1866, with a much more extended application of its terms, and became, as it was intended it should be, the death-blow to the entire State banking interests of the country, by which the Government found itself master of the currency, with a ready market for its bonds.

However defensible the action of the Government may be considered at a time when it was hedged in by difficulties not easily surmounted, and notwithstanding the fact that the Supreme Court has given its sanction to the constitutionality of the acts by which this tax was imposed, it will yet be questioned by all fair-minded citizens whether the Federal Government is clothed with the authority requisite to the imposition of a tax for the professed and avowed purpose of crushing out of existence a bank or any other corporation chartered under the laws of one of the several States of the Union. And yet Chief Justice Chase, in delivering the opinion of the court in the case of the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, 8 Wallace, 549, says:

Congress may restrain by suitable enactments the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority.

This, too, in the very face of the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Briscoe vs. The Bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, (11 Peters, page 257,) where the court after the fullest consideration held that the States possessed the power to grant charters to State banks; that the power was incident to sovereignty; and that there was no limitation in the Federal Constitution on its exercise by the States. The court further observed that the Bank of North America and of Massachusetts and some others were in operation at the time of the adoption of the Constitution, and that it could not be supposed the notes of these banks were intended to be inhibited by that instrument or that they were considered as bills of credit within its meaning. The State banks, therefore, existed not only by virtue of their charters under State authority, but under the sanction of the highest judicial tribunal known to the Federal Government, at a time, too, when the atmosphere of politics was not permitted to penetrate within the sacred precincts of the Supreme Court Chamber, and when also the integrity of the Federal Government was supposed to be best maintained by scrupulously guarding the rights of the States from Federal encroachment.

The authority of Congress to tax the property of the banks and of all other corporate bodies the same as that of individuals has never been questioned. But can it be fairly maintained that there is any such deposit of authority in Congress which would justify it in fostering a monopoly of its own creation by taxing out of existence a corporate body chartered by a State? Admit the correctness of the principle by which it is sought to justify the imposition of this tax, and you will find but little difficulty in applying it to "any other description of corporations, such as railroads, turnpikes, manufacturing companies, and others."

The dissenting opinion (Nelson and Davis, judges, concurring) in the case of The Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, heretofore referred to, says:

The imposition upon the banks cannot be upheld as a tax upon property, neither could it have been so intended. It is simply a mode by which the powers or faculties of the States to incorporate banks are subjected to taxation, and which, if maintainable, may annihilate those powers.

And further:

This taxation of the powers and faculties of the State governments, which are essential to their sovereignty and to the efficient and independent management and administration of their internal affairs, is, for the first time, advanced as an attribute of Federal authority. It finds no support or countenance in the early history of the Government or in the opinions of the illustrious statesmen who founded it.

These statesmen scrupulously abstained from any encroachment upon the reserved rights of the States; and within these limits sustained and supported them as sovereign States. We say nothing as to the purpose of this heavy tax of some 16 per cent. upon the banks, ten of which we cannot but regard as imposed upon the power of the States to create them. Indeed, the purpose is scarcely concealed, in the opinion of the court, namely, to encourage the national banks. It is sufficient to add that the burden of the tax, while it has encouraged these banks, has proved fatal to those of the States; and if we are at liberty to judge of the purpose of an act from the consequences that have followed, it is not, perhaps, going too far to say that these consequences were intended.

Does not sound policy clearly indicate the repeal of this tax?

Perhaps no subject has of late occupied a larger space in the public mind than that of the currency; a subject upon which neither of the great political parties of the country has been able to entirely unite its followers and which has caused the production of more nostrums for the immediate and complete relief of the country; for restoring confidence and awakening the slumbering looms of prosperity than any other question which has claimed the attention of the American people since the war. Arrayed upon the one side are the friends of contraction; upon the other the advocates of inflation; while upon a middle ground are found those who believe in the maxim, "In medio tutissimus ibis" When contraction was supposed to be the policy of the Administration, despair took the place of confidence and bankruptcy seemed the impending fate of a large proportion of the most important business interests of the country, while on the other hand inflation produced absolute want of faith in the integrity of every "promise to pay" which the Government had issued and of every obligation which it had created, so that to avoid Scylla on the one hand and Charybdis on the other has been the effort of those who believe "that you will go safest in a middle course."

The natural cry of the starving is for bread; equally so is the demand of a community in financial distress for more money; but it is a mistaken theory to suppose that inflation will afford any such relief.

Flood the country with as large a volume of national currency as the warmest advocate of inflation may demand and behold the consequence. Those localities most sadly impoverished and most sorely in need, from the consequences of the war, will never have realized the difference, for the reason that the laws of trade, by which capital is regulated, are not subject to the whim and caprice of legislative enactment, but pursue their own selfish purposes to their legitimate end. Capital seeking employment does not tend to those districts wherein want and despair sit staring each other in the face, but as naturally gravitates to the business centers, where it will yield the best returns, as the water flows from the hill-side to join the rippling current as it glides onward to the great ocean. This is true in a larger sense of gold and silver coin than of the national currency; but it is sufficiently true of the paper money issued by or with the sanction of the Federal Government to cause an inquiry as to the remedy to be applied to localize and restrain within prescribed limits a currency which will at least supply the wants of the community for which it is intended. Will not a simple act of justice to the State banks, by reducing the tax imposed upon them to an amount equal to that paid by the national banks, have the effect of bringing into closer harmony the State and Federal Governments and of increasing the volume of a certain character of currency which will be essentially local in its circulation, for the reason that it is wanting in the important attributes necessary to give it an extended recognition: it will not be a legal tender and its circulation cannot be made coercive? Its usefulness will therefore be made to depend entirely upon the confidence which, with prudent organization and careful management, the State banks may be enabled to create for themselves in the communities in which they are located. But however great that confidence may be, it is not at all likely that such banks can be brought into hurtful competition with the national banks, and there is every reason to suppose that they would work harmoniously together in the effort to supply the needs of local and interstate trade.

The great objection urged against the old State-bank circulation, that it was not suitable for interstate commerce and oftentimes subjected the holder to a damaging discount, is not one that can be successfully maintained in the present condition of the currency. From the adoption of the Constitution to the imposition of the tax on the State banks, the paper money of the State banks, with the exception of the notes issued by the Bank of the United States, was the only currency or circulating medium, except gold and silver, left to the States. The legal-tenders issued in the name of the United States and the national-bank notes now in circulation greatly relieve the force of the objection to the State-bank circulation by supplying the necessary medium for interstate commerce and also in producing a direct tendency to restrain the State-bank circulation within the limits of the State from which it has obtained its chartered privileges. Such a result, I believe, could be reasonably expected to follow the re-establishment of the State banks upon equal terms with the national banks.

In this opinion I am fully sustained by Mr. Webster, who in a speech delivered at the merchant's meeting in Wall street, New York, on the 28th of September, 1840, said:

> My opinion is that a currency emanating partly from a national authority as broad in its origin as the whole country, and partly from local banks organized as our banks now are, and issuing paper for local circulation, is a better currency for the whole people than ever before existed in the world. Each of these classes of institutions, and each of these kinds of currency, has its own proper use and value.

If this be true, where are we to look for the remedy? The answer can be found in the opinion of Chief Justice Chase, in the case twice heretofore referred to, the Veazie Bank vs. Fenno, in which, almost in terms of apology, he finds himself constrained to say that—

> It is insisted, however, that the tax in the case before us is excessive, and so excessive as to indicate a purpose on the part of Congress to destroy the franchise of the bank, and is therefore beyond the constitutional power of Congress. The first answer to this is that the judicial cannot prescribe to the legislative department of the Government limitations upon the exercise of its acknowledged powers. The power to tax may be exercised oppressively upon persons, but the responsibility of the Legislature is not to the courts, but to the people by whom its members are elected. So if a particular tax bears heavily upon a corporation or a class of corporations, it cannot for that reason only be pronounced contrary to the Constitution.

If, therefore, Congress has been the instrument by which this wrong was consummated, and is to be held responsible for the results which have followed, it should be prompt to afford the only adequate relief attainable by reducing this tax to an amount equal to that paid by the national banks, which, if done, could work no possible harm to the national banks, while it might be very reasonably productive of enlarged and needful banking facilities to localities now unprovided for and supply the requisite circulating medium to meet the wants of trade in those localities.

I have thus briefly and imperfectly presented some of the phases of this important subject, and trust that I may succeed in exciting sufficient interest in it to cause the able and experienced men who have so largely contributed to the greatness of our common country to give to it patient and careful investigation, that properly considered action may follow. In treating this subject I have duly appreciated its delicate and sensitive character, because of the fact that to treat it with ordinary intelligence would compel me to claim for the States certain rights which are reserved to them under the Constitution. It has become the rule and fashion of late when any one seeks to claim for the States certain rights which were supposed to have been reserved to them to stamp the utterance as disloyal, and if it come from any one of southern birth or proclivities, as showing unmistakable evidence of the bad temper of the southern people toward the Federal Government, and especially toward the northern people. And yet you find Mr. Justice Miller, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in the celebrated Louisiana Slaughter-house cases, which were decided so late as the December term, 1872, uses the following comforting words:

> Under the pressure of all the excited feeling growing out of the war, our statesmen have still believed that the existence of the States with powers for domestic and local government, including the regulation of civil rights—the rights of person and of property—was essential to the perfect working of our complex form of government, though they have thought proper to impose additional limitations on the States, and to confer additional power on that of the nation. But whatever fluctuations may be seen in the history of public opinion on this subject during the period of our national existence, we think it will be found that this court, so far as its functions required, has always held with a steady and an even hand the balance between State and Federal power, and we trust that such may continue to be the history of its relation to that subject so long as it shall have duties to perform which demand of it a construction of the Constitution or any of its parts.

Mr. Justice Miller will not be accused of any undue partiality for States' rights, and therefore any expression from him on this subject is entitled to the careful perusal of those partisans who in their ardor seek to clothe the Federal Government with every attribute of authority and centralize within it every source of power by stripping the States of the very last vestige of that sovereignty which the Constitution solemnly guarantees to them. I entertain no such vain belief that proper legislation concerning the State banks is the only want from which the country is suffering, nor by any means the remedy which will bring complete relief to the large manufacturing interests of the country and employment to the suffering laborers, whose cry of distress is daily heard throughout the land. It is too plainly manifest that the country in seeking to adjust itself to the grooves of prosperity in which it successfully moved before the war now finds the large and lucrative trade of the South an absolute requisite in the restoration of the former energy and vitality of the business interests of the whole country, and without which the country will be long in regaining its lost equilibrium.

Those, then, who seek to build a wall of prejudice and of bitter animosity between the sections; who strive for political asendency by postponing a complete reconciliation of the interests and sentiment of the country; who see in an impoverished and stricken South the highest evidence of our country's magnanimity and greatness, they may, if the country in an evil hour assent to these propositions, realize their wishes, but they will never live to see this country again prosperous and happy. If our republican form of government, the perpetuity of which is largely dependent upon the virtue of its citizens and the wisdom and integrity of its legislative, judicial, and executive officers, cannot be administered with a just regard for the rights of all the States which constitute in one harmonious whole this great and glorious Union, then all efforts to revive its drooping and diminishing trade, which by all natural laws is entitled to be prosperous, will prove futile and vain, and the line which Dr. Johnson added to Goldsmith's Deserted Village will tell the tale of our future:

> Trade's proud empire hastes to swift decay.

WASHINGTON, CINCINNATI AND SAINT LOUIS RAILROAD COMPANY.

Mr. DAVY. Mr. Speaker, the bill recently before the House reported by the Committee on Railways and Canals, of which I have the honor to be a member, ought not in my judgment to receive the approval of the members of this House. For years past Congress has encouraged railroad enterprises by giving a portion of its domain and the granting of subsidies. I shall not at this time attempt to argue that the policy adopted by Congress was a wise or an unwise measure. I shall confine my remarks to the bill reported by the committee. This bill asks Congress for a charter to construct a double-track freight railroad from the Atlantic seaboard to the Mississippi River. Now, sir, the mere granting of a charter by Congress may not be very dangerous in and of itself, but it commits the Government to the policy of aiding in the construction of railroads, which I am decidedly opposed to. It opens the avenues to additional legislation and the granting of subsidies before the road is completed. It is my purpose to endeavor to show that its provisions are in direct violation of the plain letter and spirit of the Constitution of the United States.

The importance of this bill does not rest upon the fact which is assumed here by its advocates, that there does exist a public necessity for the construction of this railroad. If a public necessity exists, tell me where it exists. Is it necessary to promote the commerce of the country or to facilitate the transportation of freight from one section of the country to the other? Is there anything in the past history of this country to justify any assumption of this kind? I submit, sir, that the exercise of this power at the present time by the Congress of the United States is unnecessary and dangerous to our republican institutions. We have advanced under the present system of government from penury to power. Our commerce has increased. For more than forty years the railroads have borne a prominent part in the commercial history of this great country. During that time the progress of commercial prosperity has been unparalleled in the history of any country; during all this time Congress has never constructed railroads through the States or exercised the arbitrary power to regulate the transportation of freights and to control the great railroad interests of the country. The prosperity of the country and the experience of the past are against the Federal Government exercising any such power.

Now, sir, is the entire railroad history of this country to be ignored? Is this system of railroading under which the people of all sections of this great country have prospered, this system under which we have steadily advanced in opulence and power, to be set aside and a new and untried system to be adopted, unknown to the past and in direct conflict with the present railroad system of the country? The advocates of this bill contend that Congress has the power to grant charters to railroad corporations, and that it has likewise the power to grant subsidies and to regulate the prices for the transportation of freight and passengers. If Congress has this power, then it has likewise the power to take charge of all railways in this country which have been built by the efforts and capital of private individuals, private enterprise, and private wealth. I believe that Congress has no right under the Constitution to assume the control of the vast amount of capital vested in the various railroads of the country. It might as well assume to dictate the value of goods and how private parties shall make their contracts as to assume the right to exercise any such arbitrary power.

Let it not be supposed that this bill is to be the last of its kind. It is only one of a series which will break down the constitutional barriers and inaugurate a new and dangerous policy. Others of a similar character will speedily follow its passage. Instead of breaking up monopolies, as is claimed by the advocates and supporters of this bill, this policy will create one of the most stupendous monopolies that the world has yet seen. Let Congress assume such power and control over the railroad system, and I ask you how long will it be before the railroads will rule Congress and dictate laws? This new policy should deeply and vitally concern the people of this whole country, because it seeks to overthrow the constitutional rights of the individual States. I trust that every gentleman upon this floor before he favors the passage of this bill will examine the very remarkable provisions contained in it. We ought to consider it in all its legal and constitutional and national bearings, for at no period in the history of this country when commerce between the States was carried on only upon the water has Congress attempted by legislation to regulate the price of carrying passengers or produce from one section of the country to the other.

I have serious doubts whether Congress under the Constitution has the power to create corporations for the purpose of constructing railroads. Where does Congress obtain the power in times of peace to enter a State and construct railroads without obtaining the consent of the individual State? Sir, there is nothing in the Constitution to justify the exercise of such a great and dangerous power, in conflict it may be with the laws of the States and in defiance of their constitutional rights. The laws of Congress constitutionally enacted become the supreme law of the land. When Congress creates a corporation to be exercised and controlled by Federal authority such laws necessarily override all State laws which are in conflict with the Federal laws establishing such corporations. They are necessarily in direct conflict with the vested rights of the citizens and interests of the States whose domain is invaded thereby. I maintain, sir, that such corporations in the future as in the past should be left to the control of the States. If the General Government has the power to create railroad corporations, I say if the power to create them exists, the power to control them must necessarily follow.

Some may contend that some of the States of this Union may attempt to exercise the power to tax passengers or commerce which may pass from any other State over their territory; but, sir, whenever a State goes beyond her reserved powers in the Union and attempts to impose this kind of legislation or burdens we have a right to appeal to the United States courts against any State exercising such an unjustified and unconstitutional power. The Constitution declares that—

> No preference shall be given by any regulation of commerce or revenue to the ports of one State over those of another; nor shall vessels bound to or from one State be obliged to enter, clear, or pay duties in another.

Here is a clause in the fundamental law of the Government which favors free trade and equal commercial privileges between the States of the Union. If any one of these constitutional provisions is violated by any of the States we have a complete remedy under the Constitution and laws of our country. In every instance where a State has attempted to exercise such an unconstitutional power her acts have been annulled by the Supreme Court of the United States. Then tell me why you ask for this kind of legislation. Is it necessary to protect the commerce carried on between the several States? No, Mr. Speaker, no such necessity exists at the present time. Wherever the State has conferred certain privileges upon incorporated companies, and these companies, relying upon the protection of the State, have gone on and incurred liabilities and invested their money and constructed their railroads, in such cases as the contract is executed between the individual incorporators and the State it would be a great usurpation of power on the part of the General Government to repudiate the solemn obligations of the contract between the railroad corporations and the State, and to rob them of their franchises or to so embarrass them as to seriously impair their utility and thus destroy the avenues and arteries of commerce upon which we must, in the main, depend. Every railroad line for transportation has restrictions placed upon it to protect the interests of the people. In almost every State in this Union the railroad companies are obliged to carry whatever is brought to them.

The common law, which is enforced in almost every State in this Union, obliges the railroad company to carry whatever is brought to it, and is restricted to reasonable charges for whatever freight it receives to carry over its road. It is not only restricted to reasonable charges for freight, but for passengers also.

I trust that the Congress of the United States will study this question carefully before it attempts to create or to construct railroad corporations through the several States to be kept under the supervision of the General Government. I ask you is it necessary, under the pretense of regulating commerce, to favor such radical changes in the established usages of the Government, based, as they are, upon the fundamental law of the land? We have never exercised that power even upon the ocean or the rivers of our country. It was never attempted to divest the State of its general jurisdiction in such matters or to interfere with the rights of persons engaged in such commerce.

The Constitution does not give Congress the right to acquire jurisdiction over any portion of the soil of a State without the consent of the Legislature thereof. This principle has been adhered to by the Government ever since its organization. It has never attempted to do otherwise except in times of war, when it becomes a military necessity; but the advocates of this bill contend that Congress has the constitutional power to create corporations, to build railroads, and some contend that it has the right to manage and control those already constructed by individuals, and by one pretext or another to divest the States of their original control over the same, which eventually must break down a commercial activity and rivalry which is unparalleled in the history of the world, a system which has been in practice for years. Every one of the roads now in existence in any one of the States of this Union derives its legal existence from the representatives of the people in the State legislatures assembled. Now, is it not far better to leave this whole question just where it is and where it has been for so many years?

The policy of this bill once incorporated and placed in the hands of the Federal Government will sooner or later absorb the reserved rights of the States and will paralyze the commercial enterprise and industry of the individual. Sooner or later a new bureau must be established known as the railroad bureau, which is to regulate the system of fares and freights for all articles transported from one section of the country to the other. This kind of legislation will sooner or later rob the States of the right of local self-government.

In 1829 there were no steam railways in our country. Now the iron rail stretches across every section of this vast domain. We have even spanned the continent with the iron bands. The commerce and trade of the country have increased with wonderful rapidity by means of this extraordinary net-work of railroads. Our system of railroads has attained its present greatness by the enterprise and intelligence of the people. It has in the main received its protection from the States, and it has received no aid except from individual wealth, with occasional Government subsidies. Under its present system it is managed with greater skill, economy, and success than it possibly could be under the control and management of the Federal Government. If the vast railroad interests of this country are to be committed to the control of the General Government, it could not fail to encourage corruption in connection with Federal legislation.

It is also claimed by the advocates of this bill that additional railroad facilities are demanded for the transportation of freight from the West to the East. This assertion is unsustained by any facts obtained from reliable official reports. If such a policy is to prevail, how long will it be before Congress will be asked to appoint a commission to fix the price of goods, wares, and merchandise sold in the United States? Such a violation of individual rights would only be tolerated under a despotic government, and if the policy foreshadowed in this bill should be established here the railways will absorb the whole time of Congress and railroad legislation will be carried on to the injury of the great class of farmers as well as all other producers and consumers. Self-government, general as well as local, is indispensable to our liberty, but interference and dictation are the essence of absolutism.

Let this bill once become a law, its jurisdictional power will at once be felt among the merchants and manufacturers, and all the arts and industries of the nation. One by one of the reserved rights of the States will be blotted out until the whole local commerce of the State will be controlled by the Federal Government. As to existing corporate privileges, which are executed in the nature of legislative contracts by the State, the power to fix or abolish them, in whole or in part, contrary to the will of the grantee, exists nowhere within the range of American institutions except for public use and upon just compensation. A railway is a highway public in its use, private in its ownership. It is the creature of legislative authority, and the Legislature, in granting its franchises which are vital to its existence, can endow it with any privileges or fetter it with any restrictions or conditions within its legislative discretion. But, having done that, the corporation cannot be harmed by its creator; it becomes possessed of certain vested rights which Congress has no constitutional power to disturb.

I have yet to learn that Congress can clothe a railroad corporation with power to go into any State of this Union, and construct its road without the consent of the State, and without obtaining the right of eminent domain, which has always been regarded under the Constitution as vesting wholly in the States, and not in the General Government. If the principles advocated in this bill are carried out, it will virtually take from the State jurisdiction over its own property, over its own corporations, over its own citizens. The Constitution nowhere gives Congress the power to take private property without compensation first made or tendered. The Constitution provides that the property of no citizen shall be taken for public use except compensation be first made or tendered therefor. Congress cannot exercise such legislation even over a place for the erection of a fort, arsenal, or custom-house, unless such place is first purchased by the consent of the Legislature of the State in which the same shall be.

Congress has not the right to take from citizens of a State such rights and guarantees as the State alone can give him, and to say that no citizen of a State shall hereafter be entitled to the protection of any of the laws of his State in the management of his own property. I, sir, am for holding the State and the National Government in their proper position and relation to each other. They should each have all the rights given them by the Constitution. And in the consideration of this bill we ought to remember what are the boundaries between the General Government and the State governments, for the preservation of the liberties of the people requires that these boundaries should be observed.

The chairman of the committee which reports this bill says that he is in favor of granting subsidies from the General Government to railroad enterprises and to all public improvements in the South upon the ground that the North has had vast sums of money for its improvement while the South has not had her share of appropriations for public improvements, and that he is in favor of equality in this regard between the States. Now, sir, as this bill proposes to charter a southern railroad, I take it for granted that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. JONES] would be in favor of granting a subsidy to this road at the next session of Congress, although he is opposed to it now.

Now, sir, I claim that the question of locality is in no way important to the consideration of this bill. I should oppose its passage if it proposed to pass through the extreme northern States. I believe in equal justice to the North and South, the East and West, and so far as Congress has the constitutional power to legislate upon questions of public improvement it should and I have no doubt will deal justly to all parts of this great Union. But the principle involved in this bill is alike dangerous and destructive to the South as well as the North.

The enforcement of this bill would be a violation of the fundamental principles on which our Government stands. It would completely undermine the principles upon which the Government should be administered; it takes from the individual States the right to legislate upon matters pertaining to all improvements of a public nature; it takes from the State the right to regulate the rates of fare in the transportation of freight and passengers; it takes from them those rights which they have enjoyed ever since our great railroad system sprung into existence. Congress should be careful how it infringes upon the rights of the States in such matters; for when railroad corporations are once placed under the control of the General Government they assume a magnitude which the people cannot any longer control.

The Federal Government has no right to acquire any territory or jurisdiction in a State except for purposes authorized in the Constitution, and nowhere in the Constitution does it give Congress the constitutional right to go into a State and exercise those great powers without the consent of the State.

The Supreme Court of the United States has said that—

> This power is exercised by a State subject to no power vested in the Federal Government. The proprietary right of the United States can in no respect restrict or modify this exercise of the sovereign power by a State. It is essential to the welfare of the citizens of the States that this power should be exercised. So far as easements by establishing public roads are concerned within a State by its Legislature, the jurisdiction is exclusive. (6 McLean's Reports, page 517.)

In the opinion of the court in the celebrated case of Ballard's Lessee vs. Hagon, the Alabama case, 3 Howard, 224, the court say:

> The United States have no constitutional capacity to exercise municipal jurisdiction, sovereignty, or eminent domain within the limits of a State or elsewhere except in cases in which it is expressly granted.

This power is exercised by a State subject to no power vested in the Federal Government. The United States can in no respect restrict or modify this exercise of the sovereign power by a State.

In the Rock Island bridge case Justice McLean, who wrote the opinion, says:

> Under the commercial power Congress may declare what shall constitute an obstruction or nuisance by a general regulation, and provide for its abatement by information through the Attorney-General; but neither under this power nor under the power to establish post-roads can Congress construct a bridge over navigable water; this belongs to the local State authority within which the work is to be done. But this authority must be so exercised as not materially to conflict with the paramount power to regulate commerce. If Congress can construct bridges over navigable water under the power to regulate commerce or to establish post-roads, on the same principle it may make turnpikes or railroads through the country. The latter power has generally been considered as exhausted in the designation of roads on which the mails are to be transported, and the former by the regulation of commerce upon the high seas and upon our rivers and lakes. If these limitations are to be departed from, there can be no others except at the discretion of Congress. (6 McLean, page 524.)

In the case of Gilman vs. Philadelphia the court says:

> The National Government possesses no powers but such as have been delegated to it. The States have all but such as they have surrendered. The power to authorize the building of bridges is not to be found in the Federal Constitution; it has not been taken from the States; it must reside somewhere. They had it before the Constitution was adopted and they have it still. (3 Wallace, page 725.)

In the case of Smith vs. Maryland, 18 Howard, 71, the court says:

> The right of eminent domain over the shores and the soil under the navigable waters, for all municipal purposes, belongs exclusively to the States within their respective territorial jurisdictions, and they, and they alone, have the constitutional power to exercise it.

Thus it will be seen that the Federal Government has no power to acquire any territory or jurisdiction in a State except for purposes authorized in the Constitution. The power given to Congress to regulate commerce among the States was intended to secure to the States equality in commercial rights. It has never been held that this power given to Congress authorized the taking of real estate belonging to the private citizen of a State for the purpose of constructing railroads thereon to aid in commercial intercourse between the States. This power to regulate commerce among the States was designed to secure complete equality in commercial rights to all the States. No State has the power to impose restrictions upon commercial business over her great public highways which she does not alike impose upon herself; she cannot discriminate against any State or any section, but her laws must affect all alike.

Congress has only given in any case the mere assent of the United States to the erection of bridges over navigable rivers, subject to its jurisdiction for the regulation of commerce. The right to build them within the limits of a State and the authority to use or appropriate the soil on which they stand is always obtained from the State. There are two legislative jurisdictions which may be exercised as to the right to pass over the waters above such soil: The Federal jurisdiction for the regulation of commerce with foreign nations and among the several States; the State jurisdiction for the exercise of its police and other municipal powers, its right of eminent domain, and the protection of its rights of property in the soil.

If Congress possess supreme authority and power to impair the obligation of contracts between the people; I say if Congress may impair or disregard the solemn obligation of contracts between a State and her citizens upon the plea of regulating commerce, then how is the power and jurisdiction of Congress over all local interests to be restrained?

It is claimed by many that railroad corporations should be deprived of the right to regulate the prices of freights because they may become monopolies. Tell me where Congress has ever attempted to regulate the rates of fares and freights in steamboat, river, and ocean transportation. Yet they are just as liable to become monopolies as railroads.

And it is also claimed by the friends of this bill that Congress obtains the power to create railroad corporations as an incident to the power to establish post-offices and post-roads and to regulate commerce among the several States. Now, sir, the Government has never opened up and constructed railroads and highways for the purpose of facilitating the transmission of mails. It has been the uniform practice of the Government to carry its mails over the highways of the States and to make them post-roads to the extent of their common use by its mail-carriers.

As civilization advances and population and intercourse increase, improvements in the manner of transportation increase. Post-roads never precede but always follow the opening of a country and its highways. So the General Government has never been compelled to go in advance of these improvements in the extension of its mail facilities or postal roads; it has always come after and not in advance of these improvements.

Sir, in all the arguments which gentlemen have made in favor of granting this company a charter they have failed to give one solitary reason addressed to the intelligence of this House why the charter asked for should be granted. It is not a question pertaining to the advancement of civilization, nor is it a question as to the development of the great resources of this country. Sir, I am not opposed to the great railroad enterprises of this country; I am only opposed to the Government being directly or indirectly connected with them.

Sir, I look upon the great railroad improvements of the age as a wonderful thing, the achievement of stretching iron bands across the continent from the Atlantic to the Pacific, as one of the great events of this progressive age. It has linked together the East and the West, and I would not raise my voice against the great march of improvement of civilization, and a general development of all the wealth and resources of this great country. If the far West is a desirable country, labor and capital will find its way there, and private enterprise and capital will rapidly develop the resources of the country. Capital will seek its own channels and outlets. Capital seeks investment where it can be profitable. Railroads will go where trade is, and where the lands are rich and productive, without aid from the Gen eral Government.

I cannot believe, sir, that it was intended by the framers of our Federal Constitution, who were among the pioneers in the organization of our State governments, that the General Government should exercise the legislative power to control the local affairs of the States. Such a policy was everywhere regarded by them as dangerous to the best interests of both governments. They have always insisted that the safety and the liberty of the people depended upon a well-defined division of powers between the general and the local governments. In opposition to all the authorities which I have cited and the reasons given why Congress should not pass this railroad bill, my colleague on the committee [Mr. JONES] still maintains that Congress has the right under the Constitution to grant charters and to build railroads and to exercise control over them, and he is even in favor of granting subsidies to aid in these great railroad enterprises.

While I am strongly in favor of a centralized government, yet, sir, I am not in favor of any measure of centralization which shall place the railroad trade or commerce of this great nation under the control of the Federal Government or at the control of any administration, however pure and upright it may be.

RETRENCHMENT AND REFORM.

Mr. ATKINS. Mr. Speaker, the great tidal wave which bore the majority to their seats upon this floor in 1874 was not an accident, but the result of well-defined political causes. The people staggering beneath the insupportable burdens of debt and taxation had reached the point where, with almost one acclaim, they demanded retrenchment and relief. Not the retrenchment which the cunning art of the demagogue would suggest, that of shifting temporarily the load from one shoulder to the other, hoping in the transition that some new method of momentary relief might be discovered, but a retrenchment which brings real relief by reaching down to the lower strata of the evils complained of, and working out a radical, thorough, and permanent reduction in the ordinary expenditures of the Government. Only two ways were open for the accomplishment of this purpose. First, by the actual reduction of salaries and other expenses of Government; and secondly, by the abolition of useless offices, the paid incumbents in thousands of instances being mere sinecures whose only labor was to sign the monthly pay-roll and pocket their salary.

The Committee on Appropriations under the rules of the House being specially charged with the guardianship of the Federal exchequer, has devoted itself with painstaking and unparalled diligence and labor to the consideration of the necessary expenditures of the Government with a view to the curtailment of all known superfluities and extravagancies. To that end they have presented the House of Representatives and the country the result of the session's labors.

No one pretends that the work is perfect. No one pretends that the committee itself could not improve its own work. It would be strange indeed if experience, that most unerring of all teachers, could not make important and valuable changes. The committee, too, had to encounter the sullen opposition of officials whose salaries it proposed to reduce and whose official irregularities were subjected to its exorcism. With these and many other disadvantages to contend with it has the gratification to submit its labors to the candid and unbiased judgment of the people. The results of these labors have become the more necessary since the receipts of the Treasury have fallen off so that the taxes will have to be increased or the expenditures reduced to suit the receipts. Even the sinking fund is being paid out of greenbacks which come into the Treasury under the operations of the resumption act instead of under the law providing for its payment.

The following table shows the estimates of the Departments for 1877 and the actual appropriations of 1876, and the appropriations of 1877 as proposed by the House of Representatives:

Estimates and appropriations for the Departments for 1876 and 1877.

Reduction from current appropriations	$39,421,961
Reduction from estimates	64,608,627

It is proper to remark that Secretary Taft, during the few weeks he held the portfolio of the War Department after the sudden and crushing fall of Belknap, reduced the late Secretary's estimates for the Army for the next fiscal year in the round sum of $5,000,000. That act alone carries its own comment. Did a democratic committee suggest the idea?

But here stands the bold, defiant proposition that neither logic nor arithmetic can alter. That a democratic House have reduced the ordinary expenses of the Government over $64,000,000 below the estimates of the Administration for 1877, and $39,421,961 below the appropriations of last year by the republican House of Representatives for the very same service.

For one I must be allowed to say that I do not believe that the reductions proposed (and that they are large in the aggregate sum all readily see) will seriously interfere with the operations of Government in any particular. Of course the people may prepare themselves to hear a wail of distress go up from pampered Government office holders all over the land, particularly from the courtly circles of the national Capital and from some of the large cities. We shall hear the cry of ruin and even treason to the country because salaries have been cut down and useless offices abolished which had only been created to make places in which to store away certain partisan favorites that they might be supported at the expense of the public Treasury. But,

> False honor charms and lying slander scares
> Whom, but the false and faulty?

Our motives have already been impugned, our patriotism impeached, because we have dared to recommend reductions in the salaries of a very few of the higher grades of officers in the Army. Such for instance as reducing the General of the Army from $18,000 to $12,000 per annum, and a few other officers in corresponding proportion. Even complaint was made because the President's salary was reduced from $50,000 per annum back to the old amount of $25,000, and which the President took occasion to veto.

The Committee on Appropriations nor the democratic House which has so patriotically sustained them in their efforts at retrenchment cannot be justly complained of, since they promptly reduced the salaries of Senators and Representatives in Congress while they have left the Cabinet officers and the Vice-President at the same which the act of March 3, 1873, placed them.

I have said that the country would be saluted with a cry of distress from office-holders after the reductions are accomplished. Doubtless cunningly-devised efforts will be made to convince the people that a democratic House has madly and inconsiderately reduced appropriations so that the public service will be seriously crippled. Sir, when these partisan lamentations shall be heard, let the question be asked what necessary office has been abolished? Again, let the additional inquiry follow: Who of all this army of 94,000 patriots in office is willing to resign his place even upon a reduced salary? Who of the household of faith, who ministers either in large or small things, is willing to take the robe of office from his own shoulders and place it upon his successor? For where one man resigns for want of full pay fifty others will stand ready to be sacrificed upon the alter of public service by filling the vacancy.

The effect of large salaries tends to beget social habits of extravagance which nearly always end in making its votaries bow before the glittering throne of the goddess of fashion, where too often they fall victims beneath her blandishments, to hopeless demoralization and crime. History is full of such instances in the old as well as in our own country.

The truth has become apparent that hundreds and thousands of new offices have been created by the legislation of the last eleven years which are wholly useless and unnecessary; in fact, they are hinderances to the efficient administration of the public service. They are found in every Department and subdepartment and Bureau of the Government. I freely admit that the machinery of government becomes more complex as it expands in territory or increases in population. As a nation grows older a greater number of officers and agents are required to attend to its diversified interests and necessities.

But I am thoroughly impressed, without intending to point unfairly upon our republican friends and impeach their patriotism or criticise harshly their want of economy, that a great many unnecessary places have been provided one way or another for the benefit of mere political parasites who to-day hang upon the public Treasury like barnacles upon the vessel's side when long at sea. In the two respects referred to, then, that of the absolute reduction of salaries and the still further reduction of expenditures by the total abolition of very many unnecessary offices, thereby saving to the Treasury the entire salary of such, a real and substantial retrenchment has been effected. It has been done in obedience to the fiat of the people spoken through the ballot-box at the last election of Representatives. Here we have a reduction of 20 per cent. in the ordinary expenditures of the Government. Is not that of itself tangible relief? Lift from the shoulders of the people an annual burden of $35,000,000 taxation, and it would be but a brief time before every branch of business would revive and the generous waves of a universal prosperity spread themselves over the broad surface of the whole country. Why, sir, the amount saved is greater than the sum of the net ordinary expenditures of the whole of George Washington's, John Adams's, and the first four years of Thomas Jefferson's administrations combined.

Strange that the reductions in public expenditures, which seem so opportune and fit at this particular juncture when our revenues are running low and both Government and people are so hard pressed, should be so obstinately resisted by a republican Senate in the appropriation bills that are agreed upon, forcing the House to large concessions or else defeat them and thus block the machinery of government.

The people who pay the taxes, however, have not been indifferent spectators of this severe struggle, now protracting the session beyond mid-summer into the sickly heat of the malarial days. Nor have they withheld their remonstrances, loud and deep, against the action of the Senate in its refusal to co-operate with the House in its efforts in behalf of economy, but have also from every quarter of the country, from county, State convention, and the democratic national convention at Saint Louis, commended the course of the House of Representatives and bid them with words of cheer stand firmly to their money bills, by which the appropriations of this current fiscal year would have been reduced over $39,000,000 below the appropriations of the last year for identically the same service. Notwithstanding the opposition of the Senate, the reductions will not fall below $30,000,000. This is the earnest which the democratic House gives the country of its ability and determination to bring about the much-needed reforms and retrenchments, the pledge of which before the people in 1874 brought it into power.

Before, however, the House could proceed to the work of retrenchment upon the appropriation bills it became necessary to change Rule 120, which forbade new legislation upon those bills except to increase salaries and other expenditures. The first struggle was to change that rule by simply reversing it and allowing new legislation which reduced expenditures and salaries, which we accomplished over the opposition of the republicans of the House, they contending for a rule which allows new legislation on appropriation bills in the interest of increasing expenditures, while the democrats resolved to reverse the rule, and did so. This dead lock between the two Houses of Congress brings up sharply before the people the relative powers of the Senate and the House.

Article 1, section 7, of the Constitution says:

> All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills.

Here the express power to originate revenue bills, that is, to collect taxes from the people, shall be exclusively given to the House of Representatives. This idea was borrowed from the English constitution, where the power to tax was sedulously and jealously confined to the Commons, because they alone were elected by the people or supposed to be in sympathy with them. De Lolme, who is universally accepted as a standard authority upon the English constitution, in commenting upon the checks and balances of the two branches of Parliament, says:

> All bills for granting money must have their beginning in the House of Commons. The Lords cannot take this subject into consideration but in consequence of a bill presented to them by the latter; and the Commons have at all times been so anxiously tenacious of this privilege that they have never suffered the Lords even to make any change in the money bills which they have sent to them, and the Lords are expected simply and solely either to accept or reject them.

In England the Commons since 1678 have been so "tenacious of this privilege" that they have not allowed the House of Lords even to amend their money bills.

Our Constitution authorizes the Senate "to propose or concur with amendments as on other bills;" but when the House refuses to concur with the Senate amendments, then it seems to me that the Senate should accept the appropriation bills as they come from the House in deference to the plain intent of the Constitution. The Commons in England and the Representatives in the United States were invested by their governments with this power because they were more immediately chosen by the people and presumed better to know their wishes, wants, and ability to bear the burdens of taxation, because those "who feel can best judge," as Benjamin Franklin expressed it, who was the author of the clause of the Constitution in the convention of 1789 which I have just quoted.

This unwarrantable stretch after power upon the part of the Senate, in which it plainly trenches upon the prerogative of the House to control the origination of bills for the collection of revenue, and, by deduction, necessarily its disbursement, has been rebuked by some of the most distinguished of American statesmen of both of the old political parties; as, for instance, Mr. Dallas and Mr. Tazewell, and Mr. Webster and Mr. Frelinghuysen, and others.

For the first half century of the Government this prerogative was never practically denied by the Senate. The House had complete control over the public purse; otherwise the biennial elections of Representatives by the people would have afforded no protection against extravagance and profligate waste of the public money.

Much stress is laid upon the argument that both bodies are equal in rights and power. In the main that is true; and yet either body might be invested with a special prerogative peculiarly its own. For instance, the Senate in executive session has the right and power, distinct from any concurrent action of the House, to confirm nominations for office when made by the President, and also to ratify treaties. These are important powers, in which the House does not share. Is it, then, at all strange that the wise men who framed our Constitution should have counterbalanced these high prerogatives of the Senate by giving to the House exclusive control over the appropriation bills in the last resort of disagreement between the two Houses?

This systematic action on the part of the republican Senate, aided by a majority of the republican Representatives to defeat the great measures of economy, has attracted universal attention. The RECORD will show that almost the only opposition which the appropriation bills encountered in the House came from the republican members, and some of them members of the Committee on Appropriations. The inquiry arises, Why this hostility on the part of the republican party to these reductions of the national expenditures? Is it because there is a presidential election close at hand, and is more money needed to run the Government on that account?

I believe that it is not denied that an examination of the appropriation bills covering the years 1868–'69 and 1872–'73, the years in which presidential elections occurred, that the contingent appropriations were much larger than other years. That may account for the excessive appropriations for the folding-rooms which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARTZELL] brought out a few days ago. The appropriations being for 1867–'68 $42,000, and for 1868–'69, presidential year, $122,000, in 1870–'71 falling off to only $37,000; while in 1872–'73, the next presidential year, the appropriations ran up to the enormous amount of $100,000. The same is true in regard to the Department of Justice, during presidential years the amounts expended being largely increased. It was especially so in New York, where Davenport, a United States marshal, admitted that he used thousands of the Government's money, under the direction of the President, to carry the election for the republican party. Also the same high-handed and lawless use of Government funds was made in North Carolina and Arkansas and other Southern States by United States marshals and other officials.

Having produced the table which shows what a democratic House thinks is sufficient to administer the Government, and which also shows what has been required and expended by a republican Administration, it would not be deemed out of place in this connection to compare the expenditures of the Government for different series of years.

Let us, for instance, take the four years of Mr. Buchanan's administration, which I have often heard denounced by republican members as extravagant.

The following table exhibits the net ordinary expenditures of Buchanan's administration and the last six years under General Grant:

UNDER MR. BUCHANAN.
1857–'58	$72,291,119 70
1858–'59	66,327,405 72
1859–'60	60,010,062 58
1860–'61	62,537,221 62
Total	261,165,808 62

UNDER PRESIDENT GRANT.
1869–'70	$164,658,273 84
1870–'71	158,141,301 08
1871–'72	153,037,346 15
1872–'73	180,229,971 32
1873–'74	194,217,210 27
1874–'75	171,529,848 27
Total	1,021,813,950 93

The net ordinary expenditures, exclusive of interest on the public debt and sinking fund, per capita, during Mr. Buchanan's administration was $2.81, and during General Grant's it was $4.41.

Take another view of expenditures. The net ordinary receipts (entire) from the 4th of March, 1789, to the 30th of June, 1875, amount to $6,333,055,338.56. Of this sum was collected from 1789 to 1861, only $1,841,935,353.62, and from the 30th of June, 1861, to the 30th of June, 1875, was collected $4,491,119,984.94; and the following table also shows the receipts and disbursements, including the payment of interest and sinking fund, during the six years of General Grant's administration, to wit:

NET ORDINARY RECEIPTS.
1869–'70	$395,959,833 87
1870–'71	374,431,104 24
1871–'72	364,694 229 91
1872–'73	332,177,673 78
1873–'74	299,941,090 84
1874–'75	284,020,771 41
Total	2,041,224,704 75

His net ordinary expenditures during the same period as itemized in a foregoing table amounted to $1,021,813,950.93.

What a prodigal waste of the people's money! Who wonders that the cry of "hard times" salutes the ear throughout the limits of the Union, but more particularly in the West and South—sections where products bear the burden of taxation.

Add to this the amount of money which has been collected from the people on whisky and tobacco by excisemen and revenue collectors, but which was spirited away in dark and crooked ways, never reaching the vaults of the Treasury, and we begin to form some conception of the enormities and frauds that are perpetrated on the people under republican rule in the name of law and government. The amount thus lost is estimated at $1,000,000,000.

Now take the Indian Bureau. First, consider its transfer in the light of economy. The impious frauds that have been perpetrated in that Bureau are disgusting to Christian civilization. By the simple transfer of the Indian Bureau from the Interior to the War Department it is estimated that a million dollars annually will be saved to the Government, while the Indians will be better fed, better clothed, better cared for, and better governed, and in every way improved. During the administration of Mr. Buchanan the average annual expenditures for the Indians amounted to $3,581,350.85. But during the administration of Mr. Grant they have cost an average annual expenditure of $6,820,914.70, although there are fewer Indians now than there were in 1860. This Indian transfer bill passed by a democratic House still stands unacted upon by a republican Senate, although as a measure of wise and practicable economy there is scarcely room for doubt.

Now, contrast the expenditures in the Navy Department under Mr. Buchanan's administration with that under Mr. Grant. Under Mr. Buchanan there was expended in four years the sum of $52,645,998.89, or an average annual expenditure of $13,161,499.72. Under Mr. Grant there has been expended during the past six years the enormous sum of $138,412,537.55, or an average annual expenditure of $23,068,756.25. What have the people in the way of a navy in return for all this money?

For the maintenance of the Army under Mr. Buchanan's administration there was expended in all $88,307,575.55, or an annual average expenditure of $22,076,893.88, while under Mr. Grant the Army has cost during the past six years the sum of $258,585,525.93, or an average annual expenditure of $43,097,589.32. This year a democratic House reduces the amount to $26,000,000.

The republican party has had undisputed control of the Government, executive, legislative, and judicial, for the last sixteen years. Passing over the period of the war and admitting that it was followed necessarily by extraordinary expenditures of public money, the question still recurs, Have not the receipts, if properly applied, been more than ample to meet those expenditures and to have gone very far besides toward the final extinction of the public debt? This is the inquiry which the people pressed home upon the republican party two years ago, and which they are pressing to-day with more earnestness than ever. If the people feel that there is absolutely a necessity for reform in the civil service and the inauguration of a more economical policy, it can no longer remain a doubtful question as to what party can best promote and bring about these important results.

These abuses and extravagances have grown up under republican administration, doubtless against the protest and active opposition of many well-meaning members of the republican party. But the great and overwhelming majorities in both Houses of Congress seemed to have been guided by the doctrine that the good things of the Government should be lavished upon the zealous and faithful of their partisans, and there being more applicants than offices or agencies or contracts, other and additional places and emoluments have been created as a reward for these zealous applicants, until the country is swarming with office-holders and staggering beneath the frightful burden of debt, which demoralizes the people, undermines their confidence in their rulers, and utterly crushes the spirit and life of all healthy business enterprise. I repeat, that such has been the rush for office and contracts from the Government since the war, anything in fact to keep from honest labor, that leading republicans have admitted upon the floor of the House (Messrs. GARFIELD and HALE) that the democratic party could better wrestle with these abuses and extravagances than the Administration party could. Their party have tolerated these evils so long that these concessions are now expected and demanded by their adherents, and hence it requires a greater amount of moral power to resist the solicitations and demands of greedy applicants. No wonder that GARFIELD and HALE despair of the power and efficiency of the republican party to effect true reform and economy when it is notorious that the public sentiment of the party, with few exceptions, regards the patronage of the Government as legitimately belonging to the republicans alone, while the corrupt elements of the party regard the Government and its Treasury as legitimate booty to be plundered; in a word, that loyalty to the Government embraces the right to rob the Government. That such a sentiment is entertained and practiced upon we have too many distinguished instances, I regret to admit for the honor of the American name. These instances run up into the hundreds, if not thousands, of those who wear or have worn the insignia of office, the sworn protectors of the revenues and honor of the Government, extending all the way up from the deputy revenue-collector or deputy marshal or postmaster to the Cabinet minister or the foreign diplomat.

But at last is it to be wondered at that such demoralization should exist in the minds of these corrupt officials, whose lust for sordid pelf has induced them to pilfer the revenues of the Government or barter for gold the offices of the Republic, and thereby bring reproach and disgrace upon the honor of the nation, when we behold their leading offenders arraigned as in one case for bribery under articles of impeachment before the most august judicial tribunal of the continent, if not of the whole earth, where the chief counsel makes an appeal in behalf of his client to the political and sectional prejudices of a majority of the court in the matter of jurisdiction—a purely legal and constitutional question—in which he eloquently points to the military services of the distinguished accused during the late war in defense of the American flag and pleads his military services in extenuation?

And again, when our embassador and minister plenipotentiary to the most renowned court of the world—the court of St. James—so far descends from his lofty ministerial dignity and just appreciation of the honor and sovereignty he was accredited to uphold as to engage in private speculation in the uncertain stocks of bogus mining companies in which western adventurers so delight to gamble that a committee composed of democrats and republicans, to speak as mildly as possible, resolve that he is guilty of conduct "ill-advised, unfortunate, and incompatible with the duties of his official position," thus in effect driving him from public life to retirement, where the shadow of his folly will continue to color and deepen upon his future pathway as public sentiment shall become brighter and purer—I say in the face of these facts it becomes food for public reflection that an honorable member of this House, a member, too, of the Committee upon Foreign Affairs who agreed that the course of this minister was "incompatible with the duties of his official position," should nevertheless rise in his place and endeavor to arrest the descent and break the fall of this renowned personage upon the ground of his having been a general in the Union Army. Is patriotism thus to be smirched by official degeneracy? Who of all the poor private soldiers of the Federal Army who may have been accused and tried for crime in the courts of the country have been excused and their crimes palliated and apologized for as have the distinguished ex-Secretary of War and ex-minister to England?

Shall patriotism be made a shield for public crime among the great of the land? Who of the bright names that adorn their country's annals, the Hancocks and McClellans and others, are willing that patriotism and valor in war shall be prostituted to the protection and defense of public criminals because they have been magnates in the party? I would fain believe that honorable gentlemen, Representatives upon this floor, do not intend to be understood by the country as indorsing official corruption in high places, but in the intensity of their partisan zeal they have overstepped the barriers of justice and offer excuses for malfeasants by appealing to the sectional prejudices and angry passions which deluged the land during the late war, which good men North and South should now know of only as they read the cold and impartial page of history. The great and overwhelming necessity of this hour in our country's history is the purification of the public service; and the public man, however honest and upright he may be himself, who even seems to defend the follies and crimes of his party leaders, himself strikes a blow at public liberty all the more deadly and fatal because of the subtle and dangerous sentiment which, dressed in the pleasing garb of patriotism, infuses itself into the body-politic as a noxious pestilence fills the air and thus spreads the seeds of disease and death around.

As a government we have lived only one hundred years, and the time therefore seems peculiarly appropriate to survey the anchorage of the present and take its soundings and bearings ere we cast anchor and unfurl our flag for another century's cruise. We have learned much that is valuable and true, and likewise we have fallen into some errors; chief among them is the bane of party spirit, which sees no good in a political opponent and acknowledges no fault in a partisan friend. Let us root out this evil, and acknowledge and bow with heartfelt reverence before the saintly genius of virtue, no matter whether robed in purple or clothed in rags, whether decked in the smiles and blandishments of the splendid court circle or hidden within the obscurities which circumscribe the habitations of the lowly and poor, whether we find it in a republican or a democrat.

The masses of the people are not yet prepared to consent to the divorce of public virtue and patriotism, and they will suspect the genuineness of that pseudo patriotism which attempts to screen from just public indignation the derelict in virtue. It is impossible to separate the true and genuine patriotism which prompts one to the discharge of honorable representative trusts from the closest alliance with the behests of the most exalted and stainless public virtue.

The most careless observer of the times does not fail to mark as a prominent and absorbing evil, now deeply inlaid in the body-politic, the inordinate thirst for large wealth. Here is a vast mine for reflection at the portals of which I can only stand a moment and look in. I avoid entering its mazy labyrinths and dark and hidden recesses. I refuse to comment upon and account for the sudden and immense fortunes which class legislation, protective tariffs, banking monopolies, and railroad speculations have invested many penniless adventurers with during the last decade and given them power and influence which they have persistently and selfishly employed for their own good and the people's injury. I have no war to make upon wealth honorably obtained. I scorn a communist or an agrarian, who, too slothful to work, would rob under the pretense of equality and equity his more industrious and well-to-do neighbor. I do most reverently bow to the sacred wisdom contained in the simple saying of the Creator, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread."

But what I wish to say is this: After a good long experience and a rather extensive observation I am driven irresistibly by the uniform current of events, without exception, to believe that the public man in this country who entering the public service poor and in a few or many years finds himself rich has not been faithful to his public trusts, and has soiled the purity of his official character in some way or other. All are not equally criminal in degree. Some have developed into bold and brazen thieves; others have sold offices and agencies; some have voted themselves lands; some have protected by their votes corporations in which they were owners of stock; some one way and some another; but, no matter how, he who has allowed himself to profit by his vote to that extent has smirched his official purity. Such a man is unworthy of public confidence, and instead of standing up in defense of public justice and manfully struggling for the interests of the people, he is the interested advocate of the moneyed rings and of all measures which seek to despoil the many and concentrate the wealth of the land in the hands of the few. It is the same old story by which ancient and modern empires have been built up on the ruins of free government throughout the history of time.

Is it not time, sir, to hurl these faithless rulers from the Tarpeian Rock of public indignation and to return to the memories, habits, manners, and teachings of our fathers? Does not history point us to the sin of covetousness as the one grand cause of the fall of free government throughout the centuries of the world's annals? Is not the career of all tyrants signalized by the possession of unbounded wealth? In the degenerate days of the Roman Empire did not ambitious leaders scatter their golden ducats among the people as largesses to corrupt their patriotism, debauch their heroic virtue, and finally lead them willing captives to the footstool of absolute power? No age of the world better understood the influence of the passion of covetousness upon the mind of man than at this very period when Virgil wrote: O! sacred thirst for gold! What will it not compel mortal breasts to do?

Sir, we need to turn back the dial one hundred years and cultivate the simple but heroic virtues of our fathers. Money is not a demi-god that we should worship; for "the love of money is the root of all evil." Never was there a period in our remarkable history as a people when we could so profitably enter upon the duty of self-examination. While we have astonished the world with the magnificence and splendor of the material elements which have crowned our growth and attainments, and while our citizen soldiery on both sides in the late war have written the American name first upon the roll of military nations, and our poets, orators, historians, and scientists have plucked by consent from a jealous public, for their own coronation, the diadem which alone garlands the brow of genius, while in point of fact the evidences of national greatness and individual enterprise now on exhibition at Philadelphia it must be confessed eclipse the other nations of the earth, one mournful truth presses home upon every thoughtful and patriotic American—who would not have the facts of the last eleven years stricken from the record. Pass in review before you the events and facts which have thickly crowded the last eleven years of malfeasance and embezzlement, corruption, gift taking, and bribery, and the ten thousand nameless ways of indirection which the artful demagogue and dishonest official has employed to defraud the public and derive for himself illegitimate gain, and I repeat who would not drop the curtain and hide from the world's scorching gaze the dark record of the last eleven years? Would it were otherwise.

The remedy is with the people. No truer saying was ever uttered by the apostle of freedom than that public liberty rests upon the enduring pillars of public virtue and public intelligence. Better far that the succeeding generation now so soon to take our places should be well grounded in the simple virtues of our fathers, and their minds directed by simple education to a few great central thoughts of liberty, clinging closely to the Constitution as written, than to grow up in the belief that the honors of office consist in its emoluments and that the people are made for the benefit of the Government, and the Government itself made as the plaything and personal convenience of its rulers. One grand lesson presses itself upon the public attention in these dark days of official demoralization and the poverty and financial distress of the Government and the people. It was Jefferson who said "that the whole art of government consists in being honest." This sentiment should be imprinted indelibly upon the public mind as one of the necessary reforms of the hour. Public agents should be selected for their fitness for the particular position to be filled, arising out of their capacity and fidelity. The people should regard the offices they have to bestow as sacred trusts and not as "private perquisites" to be given as a reward for supposed claims. In this way alone can the civil service be purified and the public good promoted. In this way only can we bring about real retrenchment and reform.

EDUCATION—FREE SCHOOLS.

Mr. CUTLER. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Education are unanimous in the recognition of the principle that it is right and proper that the proceeds of the sales of the public lands should be sacredly set apart and used for educational purposes, but differ simply as to the mode and manner of the distribution; and in advocating the substitute offered by the minority of the committee, I believe that the adoption of it "will result in the greatest good to the greatest number;" the trust of the United States will be sacredly observed and religiously enforced; an educational fund be created, which will increase year by year, until its income yearly distributed among States and Territories according to population will each year lessen taxation for school purposes in those States and Territories, until we shall arrive at that point to which every American looks forward with pride and hope, that our public schools shall be free, and to which every child may go as to a fountain, and partake "without money and without price;" the principles of exact justice and equity will be meted out to every inhabitant in accordance with the ownership of the public domain, and States and Territories thus aided will be incited to increased effort in developing a more perfect system of free-school education, that will eventually add to the prosperity of the State, and to the future power, strength, and perpetuity of the General Government.

In the commencement of this centennial year, looking back upon the past, we stand in awe and amazement at what has been accomplished in a century, and the most vivid imagination fails to realize its further power and prosperity. Destined by Providence for good or evil, its prosperity and future power for good or ill is in our own hands; and it is well, realizing that fact, while standing on the threshold of the present, to turn back our vision and gather some useful lessons from the past to guide our footsteps in the future.

The people in the adoption of the Constitution of the United States invested the Congress, among other powers, with the following:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The most strict constructionist would fail in presenting any valid constitutional argument against any disposition of the territory, if such disposition was made for the equal advantage and benefit of the whole people, without reference to class or condition, although valid objections might, would, and should be urged if such disposition was for the special benefit of railroads, corporations, sections, or classes.

The constitutionality of the disposition of the proceeds of the sales of the public lands for educational purposes has never been seriously questioned; and, neither could it be successfully, for these lands are the common property of the whole people, obtained by conquest, cession, and purchase, and paid for by the blood, labor, and money of all the inhabitants. The title of the United States to the public lands is derived from the following sources: First, treaties with foreign powers; second, cessions from individual States to the United States on the recommendation of Congress under the old Confederation; third, treaties with Indian tribes.

In order to secure the union of the States, upon the recommendation of Congress and at the request of those States which had no western territory, and upon the assurance and agreement that Congress would hold all territory "for the common benefit of the United States," New York, Virginia, Massachusetts, Connecticut, South Carolina, and Georgia ceded their territory to the United States.

These several States in different years made these cessions "for the use and benefit of such of the States as have become, or shall become, members of the confederate or federal alliances of the said States," because all the States were compelled to furnish both "men, material, and sinews of war" to retain the territory; and in its defense the whole people made common cause, and the territory thus became common property.

The subsequent purchases of Louisiana, Florida, and Alaska were paid for out of the common Treasury of the people; while California and New Mexico were acquired at a terrible cost, in which the whole people gave of their blood and treasure.

Thus have I hastily traced the history of the public domain, and shown conclusively that the whole people are the owners of the same, and that the Government holds it as trustee in trust for the whole people.

After the cession of the Northwest Territory Congress, in the act of the 20th of May, 1785, for ascertaining the mode of disposing of the western lands, adopted, among other things, this most remarkable provision for education on behalf of free schools:

> There shall be reserved the lot No. 16 of every township for the maintenance of public schools within the said township.

The good results and blessings that have already followed this provision who can estimate, or who foretell its still future good? And afterward Congress passed the ordinance of 1787, the most remarkable of all ordinances, the fitting follower of the decade succeeding the Declaration of Independence, so grand in its inception, so minute in its details, and so remarkable in its results, that I cannot refrain from repeating the following language of Chief Justice Chase:

> This ordinance has been well described as having been a pillar of cloud by day and of fire by night in the settlement and government of the Northwest Territory.

Another eminent jurist, speaking of this ordinance, says:

> The emigrant knew beforehand that this was a land of the highest political as well as national promise, and under the auspices of another Moses he journeyed with confidence toward his new Canaan.

But the story will be incomplete did I neglect to repeat the eulogium pronounced by Daniel Webster. He says:

> We are accustomed to praise the law-givers of antiquity. We help to perpetuate the fame of Solon and Lycurgus, but I doubt whether one single law of any law-giver, ancient or modern, has produced effects of more distinct, marked, and lasting character than the ordinance of 1787. We see its consequences at this moment, (1830,) and we shall never cease to see them, perhaps, while the Ohio shall flow.

That ordinance declared that—

Religion, morality, and knowledge being necessary to good government and the happiness of mankind, schools and the means of education shall be forever encouraged.

Following the adoption of this ordinance, and imbued with the same spirit that inspired it, he, "whom God had rendered childless that America might call him father," in September, 1796, in his memorable farewell address to the American people, used the following ever-to-be-remembered sentiment:

Of all the dispositions and habits that lead to political prosperity, religion and morality are indispensable supports. In vain would that man claim the tribute of patriotism who should labor to subvert these great pillars of human happiness; these firmest props of the duties of men and citizens. The mere politician, equally with the pious man, ought to respect and cherish them. * * * And let us with caution indulge the supposition that morality can be retained without religion. Whatever may be conceded to the influence of refined education on minds of peculiar structure, reason and experience both forbid us to expect that national morality can prevail in exclusion of religious principle.

It is substantially true that virtue or morality is a necessary spring of popular government. The rule indeed extends with more or less force to every species of free government. Who that is a sincere friend to it can look with indifference upon attempts to shake the foundation of the fabric?

Promote, then, as an object of primary importance, institutions for the general diffusion of knowledge. In proportion as the structure of government gives force to public opinion it should be enlightened.

Such was the ordinance, such the views, and such the legislation of the early fathers of the Republic; and thus early was religion, morality, and education conceded to be the foundation-stones of free government.

After the adoption of the present Constitution in 1789, the ordinance of 1787 was re-affirmed; and from that time all the States admitted into the Union have received the designated sixteenth section of land for purposes of education.

In 1848, when Oregon was admitted as a Territory, the necessity of a large appropriation of land for educational purposes was conceded, and the thirty-sixth section, as well as the sixteenth section, in each township was set apart for school purposes; and since then all the newly admitted States and Territories have received the two sections in each township.

By the act of 1841 sixteen States received 500,000 acres each, which by some were devoted to school purposes, and by the acts of 1849, 1850, and 1860 fourteen States received 62,422,412 acres of land, which was also by some devoted to the same purpose.

The aggregate of the land thus donated by the different acts amounts to 137,718,871.55 acres.

A magnificent donation; and its influence for good who can calculate had the several States funded the proceeds and utilized its income for the education of the people, making the fund a sacred fund and allowing its income only to be expended. But, like all other donations given without conditions, efforts were made and successfully to enter upon the immediate enjoyment of the gift, and in many instances the lands under the control of rings were sold at a ruinous sacrifice; and the benefit resulting is only apparent in the fact that the purchasers of the same, in some instances for the merest trifle, hold them "free from the imposition of all taxes," an immunity that no individual or security should ever enjoy in a free government and should never be tolerated by the people. "Freedom from tax" should never be authorized by the direct or indirect act of the Congress of the United States, or of the Legislature of any State; "freedom from tax" oppresses the many for the benefit of the few and works manifest wrong and injury upon the great mass of the people, and compels labor to pay the tax that protects the property of the wealthy.

The immunity from tax enjoyed by the owners of certain privileged securities has caused much heart-burning among the people, and in many instances people investing their money in these classes of securities and living upon the income thus derived have compelled the laborer, the mechanic, and the farmer in their immediate neighborhood to pay the whole expenses of the government, local as well as State, repair the roads, build the bridges, erect the school-houses, and absolutely educate their children, while they as owners of these privileged securities enjoy perfect immunity from tax and the burdens of government. To prevent the further increase of this evil, which is alienating the affections of the people from the Government because of its unfairness and injustice, at an early day in the session I introduced a bill providing—

That no bond or other evidence of indebtedness of the United States bearing interest and hereafter to be issued should be exempt from tax.

To this result the people are looking, and to that end the Government must come; and the Government will do a serious wrong if it does not at once put a stop to the further issue of this privileged class of securities for privileged classes, and privileged securities should have no foothold or encouragement in a republican government. The obligations of the Government already issued must be paid, and paid in accordance with the contract; and any effort made to change the contract in any particular would never be tolerated; but this law should apply to all securities hereafter to be issued.

The framers of the remarkable ordinance of 1787 were not content with providing for the common schools alone, but recognized the necessity of a higher education, a training school as it were, in which young men could be instructed for the higher spheres and duties of life and from which could be drawn the proper material to teach in the public schools. "And not more than two complete townships of land, to be given perpetually, for the purposes of a university," was set apart in each State; and each State organized since the passage of this ordinance has received the two townships of land. The land thus donated amounted to 1,119,440 acres.

No further grants were made for this purpose until 1862, when the agricultural-college lands were donated. Then Congress appropriated to the several States 30,000 acres of public lands for each Senator and Representative in Congress, the amount arising from the sale of such lands to be invested as a perpetual fund for the maintenance of at least one college, where the principal object should be—

Without excluding other scientific and classical studies, and including military tactics, to teach such branches of learning as are related to mechanics, agriculture, and the mechanic arts in such manner as the Legislatures of the States may respectively prescribe, in order to promote the liberal and practical education of the industrial classes in the several pursuits and professions of life.

By supplementary acts this act now applies to all the States that were in rebellion at the time of the passage of the original acts.

Under this act and the supplementary acts 9,600,000 acres are donated.

Prior to 1862 Congress attached no conditions to its grant of lands; but at that session, realizing the abuses that had existed in reference to the disposition of some of the former grants, determined that its grants should be used for the purposes indicated, and connected those with the conditions above stated.

And to what good uses the lands have been applied the following exhibit, kindly furnished me by the Commissioner of Education, shows what great results have been accomplished by the agricultural colleges:

And this brings me to the next step in congressional legislation.

The system of education in each of the States was so different and diverse, and the means of communication were so difficult, the statistics so meager and scattered, and the necessity of a bureau for the collection, presentation, and diffusion of knowledge in reference to the school systems of the United States was so apparent, that in 1866, at a session of the national education convention in the city of Washington, and representing different States, a memorial was presented to Congress asking for the creation of a bureau of education. This memorial was referred to a committee of seven—Messrs. GARFIELD of Ohio, Patterson of New Hampshire, BOUTWELL of Massachusetts, Donnelly of Minnesota, Moulton of Illinois, Goodyear of New York, and RANDALL of Pennsylvania.

The committee reported back a bill in accordance with the memorial, creating a department instead of a bureau of education as proposed, and in February, 1867, it passed the Senate, and on March 1, 1867, it was approved by the President.

Time will not permit me to speak of the great benefits already secured to the educational interests of the country. Avoiding any attempt to interfere with, direct, or control the legislation of any of the States, yet its advice has been sought, its opinions secured, and its suggestions acted upon by the educators of the land. Through it our system of education has become known to foreign governments. The value of its publications, and its ability to represent the statistics, methods of teaching, apparatus, and literature has been attested by the teachers of this as well as foreign countries; and on presenting our public-school system, institutions of learning, libraries, &c., at the exposition of Vienna it secured special recognition and forty-eight premiums, and of the four grand diplomas of honor in the educational group one was bestowed on this Bureau for distinguished services in the cause of education and for important contributions to the exposition; and in South America, at the exposition at Chili, within the last few weeks, another grand diploma of honor was given to this Bureau; and the distinguished French writer, Mr. F. Buisson, says in his report to the French government:

> The United States Bureau of Education commenced a few years ago the organization of educational statistics for the entire Union. Not one country in Europe has ever offered such complete and carefully prepared reports. America shows that all difficulties in preparing statistical works can be overcome by uniformity in the system.

But we need not go to foreign lands for evidences of the great value of this Bureau, or for testimonials of its usefulness. There is not an educator in the land, be he professor in the college or a teacher in the public schools, but is anxious to become the owner of the valuable reports of this department; and the supply has never yet equaled the demand. No public document—unless it be the report of the Commissioner of Agriculture—is as much sought after by the people as these reports of the Commissioner of Education. The value of these reports to the educational interests of the country is incalculable; and that party that attempts to abolish this Bureau, impair its usefulness, or destroy its influence will meet the rebuke of the people and will deserve, as they will secure, their condemnation.

It is a matter of deep regret that the 20,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for the year 1875, ordered to be printed by the present House for general distribution by the Senate and House, has not received the approval of the Senate but has been rejected by them.

Go to the sunny South and ask them of all classes and conditions, after their terrible internecine war, which left them so sorrowing, so dependent, so helpless, from whence they derived the suggestions and assistance by which they have secured their estimable system of common schools. Go to New England, the pioneer of common schools, and her educators and teachers are and have been the warm advocates of this Bureau and some of the States are remodeling their system upon suggestions received from this Bureau. Go to the Middle States, where they are building up a system of public schools, and they will tell you of the great aid and assistance they have derived from this Bureau. Go to the fertile West, whose system of public schools has been built up by the donations of the Government, and ask them, and their answer will be that they, too, are largely indebted for suggestions to this Bureau. Go to the young and infant Territories, and they have relied upon this Bureau for advice and suggestions in building up and establishing their school system; and what valuable aid and assistance has been rendered and given to the trustees of the munificent charity of George Peabody none but the trustees know. Go to Japan, where the influence of our school system is already felt, the Christian Sabbath but recently recognized, and our school system is being adopted and under the control and management of Americans led by the accomplished and talented Murray, and you will find that even there this state of things is due in a great degree to the influence of this Bureau. And wherever its literature has been circulated, its influence exerted, or its advice sought, all will answer that the Bureau has done and is doing a great work for the education of the people of our own land, and is carrying American ideas, systems, literature, and books into foreign countries, and impressing American views and habits upon the people of the world at large.

And some of these foreign governments now having on exhibition in the centennial exposition valuable educational material, recognizing the efficient work of the Bureau of Education, and in some instances in grateful acknowledgment of the advice and suggestion that they have received from this Bureau in the organization of their school systems, have signified their desire that the same shall remain in the United States under the control of the Bureau of Education as a nucleus of an educational library and museum; and in order to carry into effect so worthy and important an object I had the honor to introduce into this House the following bill and joint resolution authorizing the acceptance of the same and providing a proper place in the city of Washington for the preservation and public inspection of the same, and the establishment of an educational library and museum:

A bill authorizing the Bureau of Education to occupy the armory, and making an appropriation for the repair and refitting of the same.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Government building in the city of Washington, known as the armory, may be used and occupied by the Bureau of Education; and the sum of $20,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and to be expended, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the purpose of repairing, refitting, and suitably furnishing the said armory for the use and occupation of the Bureau of Education, and the establishing of an educational museum and library.

Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to receive the educational material now on exhibition in the centennial exposition.

Whereas certain valuable educational material has been contributed to the centennial exposition by foreign governments and by the several States of the United States, which it is understood that the contributors desire shall remain in the United States as the nucleus of an educational library and museum: Therefore,

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to receive all such collections as may be offered by the contributors, which collection
